Indeed, if you will refer to the January number of the World's Work, pages 13919–13922, and read the statements made and then compare them with what the Commissioner of Pensions—apparently—has written to you, you will find that he does not deny that the Government was defrauded exactly as I stated. Catherine Giesbers did defraud the Pension Bureau of $3,400. The bureau did bring criminal action against her, but nothing ever came of it—the action was not pressed, and the woman went free. I did not state that the pension was continued.

Rosetta Jackson was paid by the Pension Bureau $4,000, to which she had no right. The Commissioner of Pensions—if he is the authority for the quotation you make—is not correctly informed or he has not taken the time to carefully read the facts in this case, as I have done. However, his mistakes are not essential. He does not deny that she was "allowed a pension." The fact is she was paid $4,000 before her name was dropped.

Phoebe Wright. My statement of the case of Phoebe Wright was exactly in accordance with the facts, though in this case only your authority (whether or not he is the Commissioner of Pensions) disputes the accuracy of one of my statements, namely, that the claim was reallowed. My information is positive that it was.

Yours, truly,

W. B. HALE.

FALL RIVER, June 3, 1911.

Messrs. DOUBLEDAY, PAGE & CO.,
Garden City, L. I.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to the letter of Mr. Hale, dated 1st instant, I must write at more length than I wish, but the subject seems to compel it.

As to "misstatements," let it go at half statements, if that is more palatable. Half statements are as capable of damage as the other variety.

I will take but one of the three women named by you as represented by your paragraphs "correctly." I do not think that quite ingenuous—to say your statements are "correct" is half true. Why do you not tell the whole tale about Phoebe Wright? The Pension Commissioner says she was never reinstated. You say your "information is positive that" she was. Where do you get "information" so much more valuable than official records? I am afraid that a full recital of the exact facts you professed to expose in your magazine, with no suppressions, would have made rather tame reading and would have made the "exposures" unsalable.

I have been actuated by sincere motives. I am not an old "veteran" and have not even the remotest connection with any pensioner. I was stirred with indignation by your "exposures," and set out, with the cooperation of our Congressman, to justify my indignation. Instead of justification, my indignation has met mollification. The Pension Commissioner frankly admits that the gigantic disbursement of moneys under his charge has been attended with errors because of fraudulent claimants, but he welcomes and wants to make the Government the beneficiary of the disclosure of facts which may bring such claimants to justice. Let us be just, but let us be sincere. I am done, and subscribe myself,

Yours,

V. W. HAUGHWOUT.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read section 80 of the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from Michigan ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 81. Every clerk of a district court shall, on the 1st days of January and July in each year or within 30 days thereafter, make to the Attorney General, in such form as he may prescribe, a written return for the half year ending on said days, respectively, of all fees and emoluments of his office, of every name and character, and of all the necessary expenses of his office, including necessary clerk hire, together with the vouchers for the payment of the same for such last half year. The word "emoluments," as herein used, shall include all amounts received in connection with the admission of attorneys to practice in the court, and all other amounts received for services in any way connected with the clerk's office. Each clerk shall state separately in his returns the fees and emoluments received or payable under the bankrupt act. Each clerk shall also, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Attorney General, report and account for all moneys received on account of or as security for fees and costs; all moneys collected or received on behalf of the United States on account of judgments, fines, forfeitures, penalties, and costs; and for any other moneys received in his official capacity, whether on behalf of the United States or otherwise. Each clerk shall also keep and use such dockets or other books for recording, reporting, and accounting for all fees and emoluments earned by him and for all moneys required to be reported under the provisions of this section as the Attorney General shall prescribe. Said returns shall be verified by the oath of the officer making them and a copy thereof filed in his office. It shall be unlawful for any clerk whose duty it is to make the return required by this section, to include in his emolument account or return any fee or fees not actually earned and due at the time such return is required by law to be made; and no fee not actually earned shall be allowed in any such account.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 48, line 14, after the word "court," insert the words "including the clerks of the district court in Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 49, line 3, strike out the words "bankrupt act" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "act approved July 1, 1898, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' and acts amendatory thereof."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the bill reported by the committee uses this language:

Each clerk shall state separately in his return the fees and emoluments received or payable under the bankrupt act.

The language "bankrupt act" is very inaccurate and very unusual, and it seems to me that it would be much better to designate the act in the ordinary and usual way. The amendment I propose merely designates the act referred to and the amendments to that act.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this is a general law intended to apply for all time or until it is changed. The general expression "bankrupt act" would apply in the future to any other act that might be enacted, and it also applies to every other bankrupt act besides the one to which the amendment refers. The general language will cover all classes of bankrupt acts. It is not necessary to make it so explicit, as it might bring about an erroneous construction of the language. I think the general language is much more satisfactory than to designate any special act.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman from Louisiana is hardly correct in saying that the language here would include the amendments. The reference certainly would be only to the original bankrupt act, because that is the language used in the sentence. Of course fees are now collected not only under the original bankrupt act, but under all the amendments that have been subsequently passed amendatory thereto. I think the gentleman could hardly have any objection to the bankrupt act being specifically designated, and it should include the amendment. I am quite sure the gentleman's amendment ought to be adopted in order to perfect the language of the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WATKINS) there were 14 ayes and 28 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

[Mr. MOSS of West Virginia addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman realizes that the matter that he is reading now has no bearing upon the amendment pending before the committee, and the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I will state that when the Chairman makes that ruling the gentleman should take his seat. That is the rule of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order, and he will please take his seat.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, he must first take his seat before he does that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to strike out the last word of section 82. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEATING. Would a motion that the committee do now rise be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Not after the point of no quorum is made.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes, Mr. Chairman, it would.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes that he was wrong. The Chair believes that a motion to rise is in order.

Mr. KEATING. Then I make that motion, Mr. Chairman. We have wasted enough time this afternoon.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, when we are in the House we can move to adjourn, but when the committee is acting under the supervision of the House the committee can not rise after the point of order of no quorum is made, because that is a question that is to be voted on.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I think the Chair has not yet decided that there was no quorum present, and so the gentleman's motion is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to rise is in order. Is the motion made by the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. KEATING. Yes; I make the motion that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Colorado that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-one Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following occurred:

Mr. TOWNER (interrupting the roll call). Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman can not interrupt the roll call.

Mr. TOWNER. I am not attempting to interrupt it, but I want to inquire whether or not this vote ought not to be on the——

Mr. FOSTER Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TOWNER (continuing). On the question.

Mr. FOSTER. Regular order.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the calling of the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15578, and finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 209 Members responded to their names, and he presented the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will wait until the Chair announces the report of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee has had under consideration the bill H. R. 15578, and finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 209 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he reports the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, Mr. Speaker, before the Chair orders the committee to resume its sitting I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the House automatically goes back into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair hear me on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER (reading):

After the committee has risen and reported its roll call a motion is in order to adjourn before direction as to the resumption of the session.

The SPEAKER. Who renders that opinion?

Mr. GARDNER. It is on page 372 of the House Manual, about the fourth line from the bottom. It is a citation from the fourth volume of Hinds' Precedents, section 2969.

The SPEAKER. Is that the only authority the gentleman has?

Mr. GARDNER. That is all I know about it; that and the next one, which I shall read:

And the failure of a quorum of the House to answer on this roll call does not interfere with the authority of the Speaker to direct the committee to resume its session.

That is the same decision, I think, and found in Fourth Hinds', section 2969.

The SPEAKER. What is the citation the gentleman gives?

Mr. GARDNER. Fourth Hinds', section 2969.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Massachusetts has concluded his remarks, I would like to be heard.

Mr. GARDNER. The Chair is allowing me to address him on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, we never could adjourn, if this motion is not in order, unless the committee votes to rise. So long as the committee has less than 100 Members present all that is necessary to keep up this farce which has been going on all day long is to make the point of "no quorum." Then there is a roll call, and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House reports. When that happens I insist that you must give the House an opportunity to say whether it wishes to terminate the farce in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman if that is the only way to terminate it?

Mr. GARDNER. It is the only way, unless the committee will rise.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. GARDNER. A motion is made to rise, and a gentleman raises the point of order of no quorum——

The SPEAKER. To make a point of no quorum in the Committee of the Whole when it undertakes to rise is absolutely futile. That is the one thing that the committee can do without a quorum—to rise. It is the one thing that it can do.

Mr. GARDNER. The committee can not rise without a quorum if the point of no quorum is made.

The SPEAKER. Why, it might be kept up for six months.

Mr. GARDNER. Exactly, and that is the position the Chair is in now. There can be no time, Mr. Speaker, when the Chair has got the mace there beside him that a motion to adjourn is not in order.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman jumps from a proposition that may be tenable to one that is utterly untenable and which has nothing to do with the question the gentleman raises.

Mr. GARDNER. If the Speaker will permit me. There is only one motion which takes precedence over a motion to adjourn, and that is the presentation of a conference report. To be sure, this is not a question of the precedence of a motion to go back into the Committee of the Whole, but under the rules of the House we must automatically return to the status of a committee. Under those same rules a motion to adjourn has the highest precedence known to the House, aside from the presentation of a conference report. The high precedence accorded the motion to adjourn is founded upon a well-known parliamentary principle, that no House ought to be kept in session against its own will.

The SPEAKER. Well, nobody is contending that; that is, the Chair never heard of anybody contending that.

Mr. GARDNER. The Chair will take notice that if we go into the Committee of the Whole and if the Committee of the Whole wishes to keep the House from adjourning it can always do so by precisely this process. It seems to me that it is always the privilege of the House, whenever the Speaker is in the chair, to ascertain whether or not it wishes to adjourn, no matter whether the committee wishes to rise or not. I assume, of course, that the motion to adjourn is not made for dilatory purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the committee rising when the roll is called in the Committee of the Whole is purely for the purpose of having a record made of the absentees. The committee rising and going into the House and reporting the absentees, and the House resuming the session of the Committee of the Whole, is an automatic matter that is controlled by the rules. It has been repeatedly held when the committee rises for that purpose it is not in order to transact any other business except by unanimous consent. Sometimes a message from the Senate is received or sometimes an order by unanimous consent. Now, if it is in order, Mr. Speaker, to make a motion to adjourn, it is in order to make some other motion. True, the motion to adjourn has precedence over most motions in the House, not all of them; but if it is in order, when the committee rises for this purpose of recording the absentees, for some gentleman to make a motion to adjourn, it would be equally in order, if it rises for that purpose, for a gentleman to call up or present a conference report to the House, a matter of even higher privilege than adjournment.

On the other hand, the quorum that is necessary to transact business under these circumstances is 100, a quorum in the Committee of the Whole. If you can bring in other business before the House when you rise for this purpose, it would be a very easy matter to raise some other question in the House, and then demand a quorum in the House, and the House would then have to secure a majority of the membership of the House instead of 100 Members. A ruling of that kind, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, would be to erect a machinery that might seriously embarrass the House in the future in attempting to maintain a quorum in the Committee of the Whole House. And notwithstanding the precedent to which the gentleman refers, I think the clear logic of the situation is that when the committee rises it rises, under the rules of the House, to automatically perform a duty that the rules require it to perform, and that is, if there is a quorum present, to have it unanimously recorded on the Journal of the House, and return to the committee automatically.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule on this matter.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. On Wednesday, when we go into Committee of the Whole automatically, would it be in order to make a motion to adjourn before we go into the Committee of the Whole? In other words, could we adjourn on Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. Oh, yes. The real point the gentleman from Massachusetts makes is if it is proper and in order to make a motion to adjourn when, the Committee of the Whole finding itself without a quorum, the Chairman has the roll called and reports back to the House that there is a quorum present. We might as well clear up two or three things while we are at it. The Committee of the Whole can rise without a quorum. If it can not, you might go into Committee of the Whole and could not get out of it shortly. That is the one thing that the Committee of the Whole can do without a quorum when the point is raised. Now, so far as this point of order that is raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is concerned—and the Chair violates no confidence when he says that he has a great deal of respect for any opinion the gentleman from Massachusetts entertains, especially on parliamentary law, as being both intelligent and honest—in this case this rule, which is as plain as the English language can make it, evidently was put in here to prevent waste of time by filibustering. There is not much disposition in these later days to filibuster, but it is still within the bounds of possibility.

Here is the rule:

Whenever a Committee of the Whole House or of the Whole House on the state of the Union finds itself without a quorum, which shall consist of one hundred Members, the Chairman shall cause the roll to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the Chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal; but if on such call a quorum shall appear—

That does not mean a quorum of the House, but a quorum of the Committee of the Whole—100—

the committee shall thereupon resume its sitting without further order of the House.

That language was put in there to expedite business. Several times when it has occurred that the committee would rise that way, because they did not have a quorum the Chair would ask unanimous consent to lay before the House a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, for instance, where it was a matter of pressing necessity. And so it drifted along that way. The Chair was not trying to violate the rules; but one day there were three or four requests for leave of absence here and the Chair started to put them, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] interposed the objection that nothing could be done except to go back into Committee of the Whole automatically; and he was right. So the Chair has never violated it in the slightest degree since.

Now, this authority that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] cited is very nearly no authority at all. There was not a decision rendered on the point. The Hon. Joseph C. S. Blackburn was acting as Speaker pro tempore. Here is what happened:

Mr. Edward K. Valentine, of Nebraska, moved that the House adjourn. This motion was negatived—81 noes to 38 ayes.

Now, here is what Mr. Blackburn says, and he was one of the "crack" parliamentarians of that day:

A quorum having appeared, there is nothing now for the Chair to do except to announce that the Committee of the Whole will resume its session upon the river and harbor appropriation bill, unless there be made a motion that the House now adjourn.

That seems, as far as it goes, to support the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. Now, the headlines of this paragraph are somewhat misleading, even if they were made by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS]. But it seems to the Chair that that was not a positive ruling on the point, because it was not raised. It seems to the Chair, if this motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is entertained, it opens up the way for every possible motion that can be made in this House, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, before the Chair rules, will he not give us some citation showing that the Committee of the Whole House is entitled to rise in the absence of a quorum if the point of no quorum is made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair happens to have the authority right in his hand. Section 2975, volume 4, of Hinds' Precedents, says:

The presence of a quorum is not necessary for a motion that the Committee of the Whole rise. On February 15, 1881, the House was in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. E. B. Finley, of Ohio, moved that the committee rise, and on a division on this question there were ayes 35, noes 91.

At that time it required more Members to make a quorum in the Committee of the Whole than it does now.

Mr. John Van Voorhis, of New York, made the point of order that no quorum had voted.

The Chairman (Hon. John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky) ruled:

"The Chair will now decide this point of order, as it is now presented directly. The point of order made is that it is necessary to have a quorum in order that the committee may rise. The Chair will decide, and in accordance with a large vote of this House in the Committee of the Whole during the last session of this Congress, that a quorum is not necessary to rise, which decision the Chair has here before him."

And there are other decisions that follow of the same tenor. But in the very nature of things, even if Speaker Carlisle had never made that decision, or nobody else had ever made it, it is absolutely necessary that the committee be permitted to rise without a quorum. If it were not so, the committee would stay here from now until Christmas, possibly.

Mr. GARDNER. If the Speaker will permit——

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. Means is provided by which a committee does rise without a quorum. What I am contending is that it is the House which ought to decide, and not the committee, on the question of adjournment. Now, what the Speaker read of Mr. Carlisle's ruling, as does the ruling of Mr. Payson, of Illinois, which immediately follows it, indicates the belief that the committee has as good a right to adjourn as the House, but I do not think that is sound. The committee has no right to adjourn if the House wishes to keep it in session, whereas I believe that the committee has no right to keep the House in session against its will.

It is quite conceivable that this committee, which we will say has had all through the day about 50 members, may be composed of those who do not wish to adjourn. On the other hand, the membership of the House, coming over from their offices, may desire to adjourn. If the Chair rules in the manner in which I am afraid that he is going to rule, it is evident that these Members coming from their offices are to have no opportunity to decide the question of adjournment. It seems to me clearly that the House is a higher authority than the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It seems to me that, so far as prior rulings are concerned, the only one squarely in point is that of Mr. Joseph C. S. Blackburn.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Massachusetts say about this ruling of Speaker Carlisle?

Mr. GARDNER. The decision of Speaker Carlisle goes to prove what the Chair said, and that is that the committee can rise without a quorum if it votes so to do. But suppose that we grant that that is true. Suppose that the committee is composed of men who do not want to rise, as obviously this committee is composed to-day. Is it not fair that the other Members shall have the right to insist that the House is an authority superior over the committee, and that the House shall have the right to decide whether it wishes the Committee of the Whole to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the rule is positive. There is no question about the gentleman's contention that the House is a body of greater authority than the Committee of the Whole. But when the Committee of the Whole finds itself without a quorum anybody can raise that point, and then it is binding on the Committee of the Whole and on the Chairman and on everybody concerned to have a roll call, to find out whether or not there is a quorum of the committee here.

The only thing that the committee can do, if anybody raises a point of order and it is ascertained that no quorum is present, is to rise. Of course that is practically an adjournment of the committee. Now, if a committee, sitting after it secures a quorum, concludes that it wants to rise, it rises in the usual way by some one rising and making a motion for it to rise, and then, when the Chairman has made his report to the House, temporarily, that committee is functus officio, and the House takes charge of it; and if the House wants to go back into committee again, then some one simply makes a motion, and in this case it would be automatic, and back they would go. If it were not that way we never would get away.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARDNER. One moment, Mr. Speaker. Would the Speaker, if a Member rose for that purpose, entertain a motion to appeal from his ruling?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. GARDNER. How can he entertain an appeal from his ruling? That might require a yea-and-nay vote, and it would require a majority of the House to be present to vote on that appeal if the Chair rules in the way he has indicated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows. The gentleman made his motion and made a point of order, and the Chair overrules it; and the Chair thinks the gentleman has the right to appeal if he chooses to.

Mr. GARDNER. If the Chair has ruled, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House? Those in favor of sustaining the decision of the Chair will rise.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves to lay the motion on the table. Those in favor of tabling the appeal will say "aye."

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARDNER. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] demands a division. Those in favor of tabling the appeal will rise and stand until they are counted.

At this point Mr. HARRISON assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (after counting). On this vote the ayes are 112 and the noes are 26.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a suggestion in reply to the gentleman's statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CONRY. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order that that motion is dilatory and not in order, for the reason that we have just had——

Mr. GARDNER. It is clearly not dilatory. The question of a quorum is raised for the purpose of deciding a very important question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count to see if a quorum is present. [After counting.] On this vote there are 138 Members present, and the appeal is overruled. The Chair is sustained on the appeal by a vote of 112 to 26.

Mr. GARDNER. But I have raised a point of order that there is no quorum present.

At this point the Speaker resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. There is a quorum of the Committee of the Whole that has to be here.

Mr. GARDNER. No, Mr. Speaker. This is a question of constitutional right. We are voting on a motion to table a certain proposition. If the vote were on the ruling itself, I should not be so sure; but the motion made was to table an appeal in the House, not in the Committee of the Whole. The mace is there in its place, the Speaker is in his place, and the House can not constitutionally transact business without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is correct. One hundred and thirty-eight—no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The automatic rule applies there, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of tabling the appeal will vote "yea"; those opposed will vote "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 52, answered "present" 7, not voting 205, as follows:

Until May 18:
Mr. MCCLELLAN with Mr. MILLER.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I have a general pair with my colleague, Mr. SCULLY. I wish to withdraw my vote and to be recorded present.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. BURKE, recorded as voting?

The SPEAKER. He is not.

Mr. FREAR. I had a pair with him on another question, and I will allow it to stand on this. I voted "no." I desire to withdraw my vote and to be recorded present.

Mr. SCOTT. I voted "no." I desire to withdraw that vote, as I am paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. STEPHENS. I desire to be recorded present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have a standing pair with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN, and he is not present. I voted "aye." I desire to withdraw that vote and to be recorded present.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER. Would it now be in order for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to move to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

The Chair wishes to state, while this matter is fresh in the minds of the Members, that in a desire to be absolutely fair the Chair leaned backward. He never ought to have entertained the appeal of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] or anything else. The committee will resume its sitting.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the Chair yield?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will listen to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. Ought not the Chair to have refused recognition to the gentleman from Massachusetts? But if the Chair decided the point, then did not the House have the right to pass upon it?

The SPEAKER. Of course, the gentleman is right. The Chair ought to have refused recognition at all. That was, in effect, what the Chair did finally.

Mr. MURDOCK. But after the Speaker had decided the point, then it was within the rights of the House to pass upon it.

The SPEAKER. I know; but the Speaker had no business to recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts, or anybody else, to do anything; and what has happened since convinces the Chair beyond any controversy in the world that he never ought to have recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts or anybody else to make any motion, because this illustrates precisely what could be done. You could keep going around in a circle, wasting time. The committee will resume its sitting.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is in session for the further consideration of House bill 15578. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Before we pass section 82, I should like to move to strike out the last two words. The section provides that—

> The allowances for the personal compensation of the clerks of the district courts and circuit courts of appeal shall be made from the fees and emoluments of that year earned by them, respectively, and not otherwise.

The language "used by them, respectively," is new language. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the effect of that language?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that section 82 has not yet been read. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 82. The allowances for the personal compensation of the clerks of the district courts and circuit courts of appeal shall be made from the fees and emoluments of that year earned by them, respectively, and not otherwise.

Mr. ANDERSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman the effect of the new language in that section, on page 50, "earned by them, respectively."

Mr. WATKINS. Under the law as it formerly stood the clerk got fees up to $3,500, and in earning those fees he received pay from those alone. Now clerks are placed on a salary of $5,000, and it is only fees they earn themselves, each individual clerk, under the provision of this bill. They receive their pay out of those fees. If the bill is passed in the present form, they will receive $5,000 and no more out of the fees earned respectively by each clerk and for that particular year. If he does not earn $5,000 in amount, he does not get a $5,000 salary.

Mr. ANDERSON. The effect of the language, then, is to limit the salary of the clerk to the amount of fees and emoluments earned by him?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; provided it does not reach over $5,000. All over that sum goes into the Treasury.

Mr. ANDERSON. I understand there has been a section passed over that provides for fixing the salary of the clerk, and it seems to me that this section ought to be passed over, too.

Mr. WATKINS. There is an amendment pending on that question, but it refers to the fees in naturalization cases, and that would not necessarily change the $5,000 salary.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the gentleman intend under this section that some clerks shall receive more salary than others?

Mr. WATKINS. No; all receive the same salary.

Mr. ANDERSON. The effect would be to limit the salary, so that it might be less.

Mr. WATKINS. If they did not earn it, they would not get it; but, as far as my examination of the records goes, they have earned that amount heretofore

Mr SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Is there not an amendment pending relative to fixing the salary of deputy clerks?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think so.

Mr. SCOTT. Does not that affect directly this section because the compensation of the clerk is governed in part by the question of the fees of the deputy?

Mr. WATKINS. No; not those deputies certified to as necessary for the dispatch of business.

Mr. SCOTT. The deputy must be paid out of the earnings of the clerk, and if the earnings are under the limit allowed it will reduce the sum that the clerk is to be paid materially; the deputies do not draw the same salaries in all districts.

Mr. WATKINS. Under the present law most of the clerks receive a salary of $3,500, and this bill adds $1,500 to the salary of the clerks. That is a little higher compensation than they have received heretofore. But it must be borne in mind that the clerks of the district court have not been called upon heretofore to perform the work for the circuit court which is now abolished.

Mr. ANDERSON. The one question I intended to raise was whether this section ought not to be passed over in view of the fact that a section affecting the salary has been passed over.

Mr. WATKINS. No; the object in passing over the former section was to make an inquiry of the Bureau of Naturalization to determine whether that particular section should be amended or rewritten to conform to the naturalization laws particularly.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. If I understand the effect of this new language in this paragraph, it is to provide that in no case shall a clerk receive more than $5,000, and he may receive less in the event that his fees do not amount to that much in any one year. What I want to ask is, Is that cumulative? Suppose the fees earned were $4,000 in one year and in the next $7,000.

Mr. WATKINS. It must depend on the salary for each year.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. This section limits the payment of personal compensation of a clerk to the fees personally earned by such clerk. As I have been informed there has been introduced an amendment to a previous section which will take the deputy clerks out of their present class and place them on a salary.

Mr. WATKINS. I have not had an opportunity to examine that amendment; it is in the form of a bill that was introduced some time ago, and it has just been offered as an amendment this afternoon.

Mr. SCOTT. I will say to the gentleman that that bill does provide for placing the deputy clerks on a salary. At the present time the clerks are required to pay the deputies out of the moneys received by the office and as a part of the expenses of the office. Now, under that rule, of course it reduces the total net receipts of the office and would affect the compensation of the clerks under this bill if the total receipts of the office only exceeded the amount of the maximum salary of the clerk by a small amount. That being true, it is quite likely that this section will be directly affected by that amendment. It will directly affect that amendment in all cases where the net receipts of the clerk's office are less than the maximum amount of his salary plus the salary of the deputy. In that case, it seems to me that this section should be passed, and considered in connection with those other sections, because it is inseparably connected. If the gentleman will read that bill, which, as I understand, he has not had time to examine, he will see then that such is the case.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, we can not contemplate something that may be passed hereafter. If we find out that any law is passed that will conflict with any section in the bill, then will be time enough to remedy the defect.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am making the suggestion only because I understood that other sections had been passed upon that theory.

Mr. WATKINS. Just the one on the question of fees in naturalization cases. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Louisiana a question. This does not apply to deputy marshals?

Mr. WATKINS. Not in this section.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 85. Before any bill of costs shall be taxed by any judge or other officer, or any account payable out of the money of the United States shall be allowed by any officer of the Treasury in favor of clerks, marshals, district attorneys, assistant district attorneys, or United States commissioners, the party claiming such account shall render the same, with the vouchers and items thereof, to the United States district court, and in the presence of the district attorney or his sworn assistant, whose presence shall be noted on the record, prove in open court, to the satisfaction of the court, by his own oath or that of other persons having knowledge of the facts, to be attached to such account, that the services therein charged have been actually and necessarily performed as therein stated, and that the disbursements charged have been fully paid in lawful money; and the court shall thereupon cause to be entered of record an order approving or disapproving the account, as may be according to law and just. Accounts and vouchers of clerks, marshals, district attorneys, assistant district attorneys, and United States commissioners shall be made in duplicate, to be marked, respectively, "original" and "duplicate." And it shall be the duty of the clerk to forward the original accounts and vouchers of the officers above specified, when approved, to the Attorney General, and to retain the duplicates in his office, where they shall be open to public inspection at all times. United States commissioners shall forward their accounts, duly verified by oath, to the district attorneys of their respective districts, by whom they shall be submitted for approval in open court. Before transmission to the Department of the Treasury, the accounts of district attorneys, assistant district attorneys, marshals, commissioners, clerks, and other officers of the courts of the United States, except consular courts, made out and approved as required by law, and accounts relating to prisoners convicted or held for trial in any court of the United States, and all other accounts relating to the business of the Department of Justice or of the courts of the United States other than consular courts, shall be sent with their vouchers to the Attorney General and examined under his supervision. The Attorney General, after the examination of said accounts and vouchers under his supervision, shall transmit the same to the Treasury Department for the examination and certification of the accounting officers, in the manner provided in case of other public accounts: Provided, That no accounts of fees paid to any juror or fees or expenses paid to any witness upon the order of any judge or commissioner shall be so reexamined as to charge any marshal for an erroneous taxation of such fees or expenses.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 52, line 8: After the word "that," strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The necessary office expenses of the clerks of the district courts shall be allowed, when approved by the Attorney General: Provided further, That no accounts of fees paid to any juror, or fees or expenses paid to any witness, upon the order of any judge or commissioner, shall be so reexamined as to charge any marshal for an erroneous taxation of such fees or expenses."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman ought to explain that amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I will be very glad to explain it. It is in line with the other enactments on previous sections. The clerk of the court is governed by a fee bill and has collected his pay from the fees of his office. He still collects his salary from the fees of his office as heretofore. It is to the Government's interest that there should be a report made and an examination, so that they can verify the fees which are claimed to be earned and can ascertain which fees had been earned and had not been collected, and the clerk can be held responsible for efforts on his part to make the collection. That is one proposition. The other is that it makes it in harmony with the provisions relating to the other officers which have been heretofore disposed of.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, there is some language in the bill just preceding the amendment which reads as follows:

The Attorney General, after the examination of said accounts and vouchers under his supervision, shall transmit the same to the Treasury Department for the examination and certification of the accounting officers in the manner provided in case of other public accounts.

Do I understand that it is the intention to give the auditors in the Treasury Department the right to reaudit the accounts which have been audited by the Attorney General?

Mr. WATKINS. The facts are that heretofore those accounts have gone directly to the Treasury Department, wherever it was necessary to refer them at all—that is, where they had a supervision of them—but now this provision is that they shall go directly to the Attorney General, because he is in the Department of Justice, and he is supposed, from the dockets and the reports that he has, to be in touch with that line of work. It goes first to the Attorney General's office, and then is rechecked in the Treasury Department, which makes a double checking.

Mr. ANDERSON. My impression is that the purpose of the audit primarily in the Treasury Department is to determine whether the expenditure is authorized by law. I do not see just how that question can arise in the case of accounts or vouchers to be audited by the Attorney General under this section.

Mr. WATKINS. It does not substantially change the law. It does change the procedure slightly. It has always been the rule that they must be checked up, that they must be verified. They went first to the Treasury Department, and whatever checking was done in the Department of Justice was done after the Treasury Department had checked them.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not see why it is necessary to make the change.

Mr. WATKINS. It makes it primarily the duty of the Department of Justice to verify the accounts, to check them up, and after the Attorney General has passed on them they go to the Treasury Department for rechecking.

Mr. ANDERSON. It seems to me to be an unnecessary and absurd proposition.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not know that it is unnecessary to have these claims carefully investigated.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the House has had a very strenuous day, and I think everybody here is very tired, and those who are away from here are evidently not very much interested, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the fact that we have had a very arduous day, although slow progress has been made for the amount of time we have consumed, and I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that the best thing we can do is to adjourn, and I therefore move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15578, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MCGILLICUDDY was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Edward Kelley, H. R. 7154, Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SLEMP, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. GORDON, for 3 days, on account of important business.

MINORITY VIEWS ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 250.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, House joint resolution 250 had a report filed thereon, No. 579. I obtained unanimous consent last week to file a minority report, since which time the original report has been withdrawn—day before yesterday—and permission given to file a new report. I now ask unanimous consent for 10 days in which the minority members may file a report to the new report when it is filed.

The SPEAKER. What bill is that?

Mr. RAKER. House joint resolution 250.

The SPEAKER. What is it about?

Mr. RAKER. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to make classification of unreserved public lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for 10 days in which to file the views of the minority on House joint resolution 250. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think that the gentlemen who are interested on the other side of this case should be here when this request is made.

Mr. CANTOR. I will state to the gentleman that I am a member of that committee, and I am on the other side, and that there will be no objection on the part of the committee to granting the request of the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that night before last, when there were but a few here, the original report filed was asked to be withdrawn and a new report substituted without coming before the committee. Now, I think the minority members, who have given this matter a good deal of study and consideration, ought to be permitted to file their views upon the matter.

Mr. MADDEN. Have they filed any views?

Mr. RAKER. Not yet.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does not the gentleman think he ought to give the chairman of the committee notice to be present to say whether or not he would object?

Mr. RAKER. I desire to say I have been a member of the committee that has been working on these matters, and the last report was withdrawn and consent was given to file a new report. Now, undoubtedly the members of the committee who have been investigating and working on this matter ought to have time in which to file their views, so that the matter may come before the House properly.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I do.

Mr. GARDNER. Is there any possibility of getting this bill up in the next 10 days?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. GARDNER. Hence if the House grants 10 days in which to file the minority views it would not delay the bill.

Mr. RAKER. No; there is no way on earth that I can see. Under the program passed that we will take up certain matters, it will take the House for the next two weeks and more.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is cognizant of where the call of committees rests?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. And does not think anything would be lost?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman states this is not a resolution included in the Democratic caucus' special program?

Mr. RAKER. It is not.

Mr. BRYAN. Then what is the difference whether the minority reports or anybody agrees on those things?

Mr. RAKER. Simply because I do not propose, if I can help it, to let a resolution lie here from a committee of which I am a member and to which I have given consideration and to which I am opposed without filing the views of the minority of that committee, so that the House will have the benefit of them, or letting it go through without Members having an opportunity to see them.

Mr. BRYAN. This has not any reference to the Democratic caucus' special program?

Mr. RAKER. It has not.

Mr. MADDEN. I suggest that the gentleman have five days. He ought not to object to that.

Mr. CANTOR. It makes no difference whether it is five or ten.

Mr. MADDEN. It may. It may be that there are gentlemen in the committee who will want to call this bill up within 10 days.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] change his request?

Mr. RAKER. Why, yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman having five days? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 3432. An act to reinstate Frank Ellsworth McCorkle as a cadet at United States Military Academy.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 4167, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 4167. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] asks unanimous consent to take the bill just reported from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. To insist on the House amendments and agree to a conference.

The SPEAKER. Insist on the House amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Chair appoints the following conferees: Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma, and Mr. SELLS.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 14, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee lifting up our hearts to the true and living God, because Thou hast put into our hands a commission more sacred, more binding than any commission that we can receive from our fellow men. Thou hast appointed us as kings and priests unto God. Thou hast put us in the world in pursuit of truth. Thou hast put over us the King of Truth. Thou dost call upon us to make any sacrifice to attain to this great end. We have found that the truth is not attained except through human struggle. We pray that we may have grace to follow on in this sacred pursuit by self-sacrifice, by struggle, holding nothing so dear of worldly good or honor as our pursuit of truth. And when we find it, may the truth indeed set us free. To this end do Thou guide us this day and every day, for Christ's sake. Amen.

FISHERIES OF ALASKA.

Mr. THORNTON. On behalf of the Committee on Fisheries I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5504) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to provide additional inspection of the fisheries of Alaska and authorizing the purchase or construction of vessels and boats to be used in connection therewith. I desire unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, and I ask that the Secretary may read the letter from the department which will explain the urgency of the action that is desired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 11, 1914.

Hon. JOHN R. THORNTON,
Chairman Committee on Fisheries, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Having in mind Senate bill 5504, which you have kindly introduced, let me say that it is important that this should receive favorable action as early as possible. The situation in brief is that for the inspection of a coast line of some 26,000 miles extent of which our operation should cover 15,000 we have four men and no boats. Definite laws require us to supervise the operation of the canneries, to protect and regulate the fisheries, and to prohibit aliens from fishing. As things now are some of this work has to be left undone. The inspection of the canneries can only be carried on by borrowing from the canners, whom we inspect, the boats which are the only means of transit to do the inspection. This is a situation which has existed for years and which ought not to continue a day longer than necessary to stop it. Furthermore, we have "closed streams" in Alaska, and may close others, in protection of the salmon fisheries, but we are quite without means to see whether they are closed or not. They may be fished to-day, for all we know, contrary to law, but because there are no regular means of transportation and we have no boats of our own we can not tell what the facts are.

House Document No. 96, of which copy is inclosed, will give the situation somewhat in detail.

Yours, very truly,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Secretary.

Mr. THORNTON. If no Senator desires any further explanation of the matter than that given by the letter, I will ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana what amount the bill appropriates?

Mr. THORNTON. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. For the construction of how many boats?

Mr. THORNTON. One seagoing vessel and as many smaller ones as will be considered necessary by the department to carry out the purpose of the law which they are ordered to execute.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was under the impression that we passed a bill on this matter the other day.

Mr. THORNTON. No, sir; the bill passed the other day was introduced by myself, but no bill covering this subject has been passed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We passed an emergency bill providing for the construction of some sort of boats.

Mr. PERKINS. Those vessels were for the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They were for the Revenue-Cutter Service, the Senator from California states.

Mr. THORNTON. That is a different proposition entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to obtain, either by purchase or construction, such vessels and boats as are necessary for use in connection with the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the fisheries and fur-bearing animals of Alaska, including one seagoing vessel, one light-draft tug, and six rapid motor boats, at a cost not to exceed $100,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF PARCEL-POST PACKAGES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I submit a resolution which I ask to have read.

The resolution (S. Res. 363) was read, as follows:

Whereas on August 24, 1912, a Joint Committee on Postage on Second-Class Mail Matter and Compensation for Transportation of Mails was authorized to investigate and report upon the rates, etc., paid to the railroad companies for the carriage of mail matter; and

Whereas the matter carried by the parcel post is of a character that can be handled in a different class of car and at cheaper rates than ordinary mail matter; and

Whereas it is of great importance that the Post Office Department should have an opportunity to readjust its contracts for mail transportation, with a view of providing economical and suitable accommodations for the transportation of parcel-post packages: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Postage on Second-Class Mail Matter and Compensation for Transportation of Mails be requested to report at as early a day as possible the result of their investigations and their findings.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire the resolution to go over under the rule until to-morrow, when I shall call it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over under the rule.

ESTATE OF EDWARD B. BELL.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent that Senate resolution 112 be taken from the table and be immediately considered. I will say that the resolution has been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses, and it is the customary resolution allowing to the family of a deceased employee six months' salary. When reported I asked that the resolution lie on the table in order that the estate of the deceased employee might be properly administered. I now desire to call it up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Mr. JONES. Senate resolution 355 provides for the printing of a manuscript relative to the leasing of coal lands in the United States and other countries, by T. P. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has there been a favorable report from the Committee on Printing on this resolution?

Mr. JONES. There has been.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask that the resolution be read before unanimous consent is given for its consideration.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2800) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WALSH, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. KENYON conferees on the part of the Senate.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the Panama Canal tolls bill may be laid before the Senate, so that the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] may proceed with his remarks in relation thereto.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, which has had the pending bill under consideration, I desire to present to the Senate some of the reasons which induced a part of the committee to desire that this bill should be reported to the Senate favorably and should become a law

The bill seeks to repeal what is commonly known as the free-tolls clause of the act of August 24, 1912, known as the Panama Canal act That act was in no sense passed as a political measure, and political lines were not drawn upon any vote cast in this Chamber during its consideration. The House of Representatives was then Democratic and this body was Republican, and, so far as I recall, neither in the Committee on Interoceanic Canals nor in this Chamber was any reference made to the political phase of the subject, nor was any effort made to draw political lines. The object of the bill was to govern and control the Canal Zone and the operation of the Panama Canal. The bill vested in the hands of the President the power to appoint officers to control the Canal Zone, and gave him full power to prescribe the tolls which should be charged for passing vessels, freight, and passengers through the canal. The President has, by the bill, full power in the premises, except for what is known as the proviso exempting coastwise vessels. In that respect his power was limited by providing that no tolls should be charged upon such vessels. The bill passed the House without any division on party lines. There were more Democrats who voted against the bill than there were Democrats voting for it. Before the bill passed the Senate the Baltimore convention was held. President Wilson was nominated, and as a part of the platform of that convention there was a plank as follows:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal.

A very short while after this party declaration was made the bill came before the Senate and was passed. I was actively engaged in the campaign which followed, confining my efforts, however, principally to the State of West Virginia. I do not recall that I ever heard a speaker on either side mention the subject. I am sure that there was no general discussion in the newspapers of the State on the subject, and I feel safe in saying that anyone familiar with the campaign in West Virginia in that year will bear me out in the statement that this question was rarely, if ever, mentioned in the press, on the stump, or in the general discussions which the people had prior to the election.

The fact is, that when the act of 1912 was before the Senate for final passage, the Democrats were in the midst of a campaign to regain ascendency in the Nation which had been denied them for 16 years, and they were also fresh from a national convention which had declared for free tolls. Without thinking of consequences, most of them followed the platform declaration which I have just quoted, not stopping to consider the ancient doctrine of "subsidies." Now we are compelled to think. Now we must decide between granting a subsidy and free tolls. We must consider where mental integrity compels us to go. I dodge neither our past history nor our present duty.

The present bill is intended to repeal, and, if passed, will repeal the exception to which I have referred in the act of August 24, 1912, and when that repeal shall be made it will leave the fixing of tolls through the Panama Canal, as was the original purpose of the bill passed at the last session of Congress, in the hands of the President.

The following objections have been made to the passage of this bill: First, that it is in the teeth of the plank of the Democratic platform of 1912 which I have quoted; second, that there is no valid ground for the contention that the act of 1912 violates the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; third, that even if it should violate that treaty Congress has the right to pass an act in violation of a treaty, and that in this case its duty to do so is clear; and, fourth, that it is an act of cowardice and a surrender of the principles of the Monroe doctrine to pass the present legislation.

As far as I can do so without sacrificing subject matter to mere form I want to take these objections up in their order and give to the Senate very briefly my reasons for feeling that none of them are founded upon good and sufficient reasons.

It is entirely premature to say that the present bill violates the Democratic platform of 1912. The platform of 1912 should be read, as should every other platform, with three qualifications: First, that the legislation promised can be enacted under the Constitution of the United States. I take it that the Democratic Party, noted for its adherence to the doctrine that the Constitution is the fundamental law and must always be observed, would never knowingly declare for a measure which violated the Constitution. For many years the Democratic Party has declared in favor of the election of United States Senators by direct vote, but there was always understood the provision that this could not be done and would not be done until the Constitution was so amended as to make it possible. Finally the Constitution was so amended. If that amendment had been in a more general form, vesting in the Congress the power to fix the manner by which Senators should be elected, then it would have been the duty of the Democratic Party to see to it, so far as in its power lay, that Senators should be elected in accordance with the repeated declarations of the party.

There is also to be attached to every party declaration the provision that the legislation may not be possible on account of our treaty obligations.

I do not deny that Congress has the power to disregard a treaty. It is too late to controvert the proposition that a treaty and an act of Congress have the same dignity, and the last one to be adopted shall be considered the supreme law of the land. But it never has been the policy of the Democratic Party to break solemn treaties. I have never heard that it was a principle of the Democratic Party to do so, and I have never known of a Democratic convention passing any such resolution.

We are a self-respecting, honorable people. We recognize the treaty-making power. We realize that when dealing with foreign affairs a large part of the power and all of the work are in the hands of the executive department, and I can not believe that a Democratic convention which has not studied the question and has no specific information upon the question, nor can I believe that the mass of the people who respect their Government and its orderly and honest administration, would deliberately say that they desired the United States Government to take the position of violating any treaty. No treaty can become operative and bind us until it has received the sanction of the executive department and a two-thirds vote of approval in the Senate. The ratification of a treaty is a solemn function of Government, and by requiring that no ratification can be made until it shall have been indorsed by a vote of two-thirds of the Senate we attest to its solemn character. When ratified it becomes the supreme law of the land, and when we pass an act which violates a treaty it should be done in that solemn, deliberate, serious way that makes it certain that we know what we are doing.

The Panama Canal tolls question had not been debated generally throughout the United States prior to August 24, 1912. If there was at that time a sentiment in favor of granting free tolls to coastwise vessels, it was based upon a general conviction that we had the right to do so; and I do not think now, were the question submitted to the people, that they would, under any consideration, vote for free tolls if it were at the same time conceded that by doing so a solemn treaty of the United States would thereby be violated. We have that faith in the integrity and the stability of the American character to feel safe in the position that in every party declaration there is clearly understood to be the proviso to follow that no solemn treaty of the United States shall be thereby violated; and I can not imagine a Democratic convention instructing the Congress to violate a treaty, unless the subject had been debated and well considered. And if that should ever be done, and the people desire a treaty to be violated, it would be the subject of a specific resolution of the convention. It is not a violent presumption, but a reasonable assumption, that it should never be presumed that a Democratic convention meant by any declaration to violate a treaty, unless it passed a specific direction to do so. Therefore I feel that the plank in the Democratic platform of 1912 has annexed to it not only the provision that the Constitution of the United States shall not be violated, but the additional provision that the treaty obligations of the country shall not be violated. But good Democrats will understand that an administration like the one that President Wilson is conducting would keep an eye single to the fundamental principles of the party which have been settled by many conventions, and by the action of Democrats in both Houses of Congress. If there be anything as to which the Democratic Party is committed, it is upon the subject of subsidies.

In its platforms, from the stump, and in the votes of its members in both branches of Congress the party has adopted the policy of opposition to subsidies. Those who have discussed this position from a standpoint antagonistic to mine have taken some trouble to define the meaning of the word "subsidy." I find that Webster's Dictionary describes a "subsidy" to mean—

> A grant from the Government or from a municipal corporation, or the like, to assist and promote an enterprise deemed advantageous to the public; a subvention.

I find that a "subvention" means "A Government aid or bounty." We need go no further in definitions to arrive at the conclusion that this is the very thing which the Democratic Party has declared against. The most prominent illustration from which the meaning of the Democratic Party's hostility to subsidies may be obtained is, strange to say, what is known as ship subsidies, the very subject with which we are dealing at this time. The principle upon which the Democratic Party opposes subsidies is that it is the taking of the money of all the people and giving it to a few; that the shipping business is, after all, but the business of a common carrier. Ships are to the sea what railroads are on the land. They carry freight and passengers for hire. The subsidies granted to the transcontinental railroads, in order to develop our country, probably did much to stimulate business, and some go so far as to argue that without these subsidies the great West would not have been developed. I do not exactly agree with this theory, and feel that, in proper time, the enterprise of the people and the resources of the West would have been a combination of brains and opportunity which would have done the work in plenty of time and would have saved us many follies in government. But I have been unable to see why a grant of land or money to a railroad is not the same thing as a grant of money to ships.

What was the ship subsidy which the Democratic Party has opposed? It was nothing more nor less than a grant of money from the Government to the owners of ships, to induce them to buy more ships and to engage further in the construction of vessels of commerce. Whatever may come of this discussion, whatever may come to the pending legislation, I have no apprehension that the sober judgment of the American people will fail to find ground to distinguish between a grant of money to shipowners and the free tolls provision of the act of 1912.

Say the amount which we could collect from coastwise vessels should be $2,000,000 a year; if we collect it, it goes into the Treasury; if we do not collect it, it stays in the hands of the shipowners, who otherwise would pay it to the Government. In the one instance the Government would get it and put it into the Treasury for the benefit of all the people; in the other case the shipowners would keep it in their own pocket, and it would never get into the Treasury. If the amount which the ships would pay for going through the canal would amount to $2,000,000, then we are subsidizing those vessels to the extent of $2,000,000.

In order to illustrate this further, suppose we should add to this pending bill, which will require coastwise vessels to pay tolls, a provision requiring the Government to repay to the owners of coastwise vessels the exact sum which may be collected from them, such payments to be made, say, within 60 days after collecting the same, and, for the purpose of carrying out that provision, we should make a permanent appropriation from year to year to cover the same. If the amount of the tolls on coastwise vessels should be $2,000,000 a year, we would collect the $2,000,000 a year and then pay it back to the vessel owners. This would be clearly a subsidy. It would be a payment of money by this Government to vessel owners, just as the ship-subsidy bill of a few years ago provided. It would be a direct payment out of the Treasury of the United States; and if we mean to exempt coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, that is the way to do it. That would not violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. We would be passing our coastwise vessels through the canal without discriminating against any other country, and strictly in accordance with the terms of the treaty. Neither England nor any other country on earth could or would raise any objection to that course. As the Senator from Massachusetts has shown, the world objects only to our mode of accomplishing free tolls, recognizing that we can do so by granting a subsidy. It was on the ground that it is a subsidy that Secretary Knox upheld the law. But by doing thus we would commit ourselves to the policy of subsidizing vessels, and thereafter no Democrat could consistently insist that seagoing vessels should not be similarly subsidized.

If the principle of subsidy is right—that is, if it be best for this Government to pay money out of its Treasury belonging to all the people for the purpose of encouraging a coastwise trade—then it is also a good thing to pay money out of the Treasury to encourage the seagoing trade. If we mean to be for subsidies, we ought to do it directly and in the open.

I do not believe that the convention of 1912 nor the voters who elected Mr. Wilson meant or intended that any plank in the Baltimore platform was to reverse the Democratic position on the subject of subsidies, and therefore the Democratic Party must now solve this question by determining whether or not they are more wedded to the antisubsidy policy of the party or to the free-toll doctrine which got into the platform of 1912. If the following clause had been added to the plank on free tolls, what would have been the result? "We favor free tolls, whether the law shall violate any treaty or not; and in order to get them we modify our party position against ship subsidies." That would have been the frank and open way of doing it if the theory of some of us be correct.

Mr. President, the people have always been compelled to watch closely the devious and subtle ways of those who never give up "the patient search and vigil long" for subsidies. History shows that they have come in every form, and once encouraged they hang on with the firm grip of a Republican postmaster. The literature of this discussion has been enriched by the following liberal translation from a tablet found in the excavations at Karnak, which speak of a time 3,500 years before the Shipping Trust saw the budding opportunity in the act of 1912.

> In the days of Seti there arose a mighty controversy which shook all Egypt.
> It appears that in a prior reign a certain Egyptian had been granted the royal favor of exclusively carrying in vehicles all goods on the roads between Karnak and Memphis, which were not ass laden. A company was organized around this franchise, known as the Karnak-Memphis Transfer Co., and its vehicles quickly drove all asses off the roads.
> In later years Seti built another road, much shorter and better, and which promptly became immensely popular for all the caravans between Assyria and Babylonia on the east and Abyssinia on the west.
> The cost of this new road was about 400,000,000 shekels, and was paid out of the royal treasury; but the purpose was, and it was so declared, that this cost was to be defrayed finally by tolls levied on the vehicles, caravans, and asses of all nations using the road. To this declaration the nations joyfully assented, for, be it known, the road was of enormous interest to them.
> But at about the time the road was to be dedicated, the transfer company solemnly declared that its exclusive franchise would be impaired by charging it tolls. It claimed that requiring it to pay tolls along with foreigners when Egypt had built the entire road was to surrender Egyptian sovereignty—was, in fact, truckling to Babylonia; that there could have been no motive in building the road if its franchise and business were to be taxed; it charged finally that the term "all nations" could not have included Egypt, which built the road.
> All this produced a high degree of botheration to Pharaoh, for the people, who, before the road was built, regarded the company as a trust, now showed a profound tendency to regard it as a benevolent organization. The air rang with "bad faith," "unconstitutional," "treason," "truckling to Assyria" and the whole nation divided itself into "tollites" and "antitollites."
> So Pharaoh, in profound distress, proposed a change in the law by exempting the company from tolls. But at this the nations protested, for said they, "If our tolls are to be based on cost, then it is obviously to our advantage to have as many pay as possible." And so the battle raged.
> At this crisis a Hebrew from Goshen appeared at the palace and addressed the King in this wise:
> "O King, live forever. Why art thou bothered over this simple question? Dost thou not know that this company hath charged thy subjects all the traffic would bear? Does thou not know that it is already a monopoly in restraint of trade under the antitrust act of the Shepherd Kings? Dost thou not know that it hath waxed fat and arrogant and hath driven all asses off the road from Memphis to Karnak? Dost thou not know that its exclusive franchise of carrying all the freight is immensely valuable? And dost thou not think that it is arrogant and impious for it, with one exclusive franchise, to ask for another, and to throw thy kingdom into turmoil to get it?"
> At this, the tablet says, the King replied:
> "Isaac, my son, I perceive that thou art the goods, and that I, even I, am an illustrious chump. Bring hither the directors of that company that they may be slain before me, and that their houses be made a dunghill, and, as for their franchise, granted by my foolish father, let it be instantly abolished."

But Isaac replied:

"O King, live forever; but be not hasty in this thing. Justice requireth not this decree. Hast thou not heard, even from thy father, that every man—and Kings sometimes—worketh for his own interests? Why rage and marvel that men are selfish? Marvel, rather, that any be unselfish."

"Isaac, my son," continues the tablet, "thou art wise in thy generation; but these men have conspired against the royal treasury, for my sweaty subjects have built this road and have dug the shekels from the Nile's soil to pay for it. If, then, these men be not knaves, they be lunatics or fools. Let them all be taken at once to the royal bughouse that this pest be not propagated and that my subjects be no longer deceived."

Congressman BOWDLE, of Ohio, one of the geniuses of that body, is my authority for this historical reference.

My position is that the true way to solve this is to meet a foreign situation which now confronts us and leave our position upon subsidies, our position upon free tolls, our relations to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, all for future adjudication and decision. There will not be much in the shape of tolls collected through the Panama Canal until probably after the formal opening in 1915. We are starting in to try out not an inland waterway, but an extension of the ocean. We have spent about $400,000,000 of the people's money. It was the money of all the people. Whether it will pay a return upon that money, whether or not it will prove in the end beneficial to this country, are matters as to which our hopes are high, but our cool judgment tells us it must be a matter for the future alone to tell. We know in our hearts that the scheme is experimental. Like the brave people that we are, we take the chance. We did what seemed to be the right thing at the time, and we now have the canal and must open it next year, and let the future determine whether our expenditures have been wise.

It seems to me that we ought to be slow to settle any permanent policy concerning it. We owe it as a solemn duty to the people of the United States, whose money we have expended and whose property we now hold in trust, to make that canal yield a fair return upon the money. We have no right to give away any of that return to any private firm or corporation without the specific, unmistakable direction of the people to do so; and in considering this question we must remember that it is hard to put on a toll, but it is always easy to take one off. It is easy to reduce rates, but hard to raise them. It seems to me that, as a matter of good business, we ought to determine how much paying traffic will go through the canal. We ought to test its earning capacity before we experiment with subsidies and special privileges to private individuals. That is what a prudent person would do in any business, and that is what we should do in handling the people's business.

It so happens that this principle and policy fits into the present situation beautifully. We can make this experiment with the canal before anyone could be affected very much, and in the meantime the Democrats of the United States will have met in their various conventions in the States and congressional districts, and it can be known whether or not the platform of 1912 was the deliberate judgment of the party. There is no need to take the chances of putting ourselves in the unenviable attitude of favoring ship subsidies or the disagreeable and dangerous attitude of violating a treaty with a friendly nation. There is no need for us to do a thing which business experience may teach us is a mistake; and therefore the wise, prudent, and just thing to do is to repeal the free-tolls clause, leave this matter, as we have left all other matters connected with the canal, in the hands of the President, and pass with this bill Senator SIMMONS's proviso, which reserves to us as a Nation all rights which we could possibly have or claim under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; that is, negative the idea or the fear that in passing this bill we are voluntarily surrendering any rights.

This will be a complete answer to all the arguments which we have heard about surrendering American rights to a foreign country. We are not surrendering any rights; we are not showing cowardice; we are not pulling down the flag; and if the bill shall be passed with the Simmons proviso we will be free from the claim of anyone that we are construing our treaty either one way or the other. The Democratic Party will be free from the charge that it is violating the Democratic platform. Congress will be relieved from the imputation that it is making a mistake from a business standpoint, and the Democratic Party will be further relieved from the imputation that it is granting a ship subsidy. The foreign question, the business question, and the political question will all be left for decision at that time, when a decision will be necessary and when a final position will have to be taken.

I am amazed that anyone should state with positiveness that England must be wrong in her claim regarding this treaty; in other words, that she has no ground for her contention. Let us consider this a moment. There is the State of New York, represented here by a Senator who has been Secretary of War, Secretary of State, and a Senator of the United States, and a prominent lawyer all his life; also by a distinguished jurist who has spent most of his mature life upon the bench of one of the great courts of the Empire State of New York—both of them men of conceded ability. So far as the interests of the State of New York may be concerned, it would be naturally conceded that both view this question from the same standpoint, and yet both, as lawyers and as statesmen, disagree. Take the great State of Louisiana, represented by strong, vigorous lawyers of experience and ability. Both have had experience in public life; both have the courage of their convictions, and yet they differ upon this question. Take the State of Kentucky, represented by two vigorous men of well-known ability and of high character, men who have fought upon every known battle field of civil life; both love Kentucky and her people, and yet they differ as to what this treaty means. Take the great State of Mississippi. One of the Senators from that State on this floor has been a soldier, the governor of his State, and has appeared in public discussions from platforms in most of the States of this Union. The other has served most of his mature life in the lower House and in the Senate of the United States. Both of them are clear-headed, warm-hearted, and both have the courage of their convictions. Both love their native State and their people and their country with true southern ardor. They disagree as to the meaning of this treaty. Take the State of Tennessee. On the one side is a great judge, and on the other side is a great business man and editor; both view this question from the standpoint of Tennessee and her immense interests, and yet they disagree. Take the State of New Hampshire. On the one hand is the Republican leader and one of the oldest in the service of this body, and we know that he would not intentionally misrepresent his State. The other representative is a young, active, vigorous lawyer, and advocate of popular rights, who by personal contact we know to be conscientious and faithful to every trust. These two representatives of that great State disagree.

The same is true of the two Senators from Kansas and the two Senators from Montana. As to each and all I can testify to ability, fidelity, and a sincere desire to do right. Take my own State. The other side of this question is advocated by a Senator who has been in public life practically since he became 21 years of age, first as an officer in the Army, then district attorney, then Secretary of the Navy, then a Member of Congress, and then for over 20 years a circuit judge of the United States, and now a United States Senator; and much as I respect his learning and ability, I can not see my way clear to agree with him upon the construction of this treaty. In none of these cases can the differences be traced wholly to political bias. A Democrat disagrees from a Democrat, Republican from Republican, Democrat from Republican, and Progressive from both of us. In England we find some advocates of the position that we have the right to enforce our doctrine of free tolls. This is unquestionably advocated by one law journal, some newspapers, and some of the public men of England, all of which goes to show that in England and the United States there is independence of thought and freedom of its expression. But it also demonstrates that this is that kind of a controversy as to which honest men can differ, and we have not the right to say that it is clearly one way or the other, but should leave it to friendly discussion and agreement, if possible; if not, then to some tribunal which can decide it once and for all and leave both Nations to adopt that course, under the decision which may be rendered which the domestic policies and necessities of either may dictate to the legislative branch of the Government as best. We are not justified in saying that this is a plain question, free from doubt. On the contrary, it is a grave problem at best. I have studied it with care. I have tried to reach correct conclusions, and the more I have studied it the more I have become convinced that we are not justified in saying that England is simply obstinate and arbitrary in maintaining her present position, and I have come to that conclusion for reasons which I will give further on in this discussion, which are based upon economic as well as upon legal grounds.

But at some time and in some place the true construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty must be and will be made, unless, indeed, this country shall ruthlessly and needlessly either deliberately break it or abrogate it, or shall persist in doing what it has never permitted any other nation to do—decide all disputed questions according to its own pleasure.

Ex-President Roosevelt is credited with the suggestion that it is our duty to arbitrate the question at issue. Assuredly he is neither a coward nor a quitter. He was President when the treaty was ratified. If the recent published interview with him was authorized, he believes that the question at issue should be decided in our favor; but he does not contend that we should be witness, lawyer, jury, judge, and sheriff in our own case. On the contrary, he contends that we should agree to arbitrate the case before The Hague international tribunal. But the defenders of the Shipping Trust's demands call such a course a "surrender" of everything, including the "Monroe doctrine." When I use the term "defenders of the Shipping Trust," I would not have it construed in an offensive sense. The opponents of repeal are admittedly careless in the use of adjectives to describe the "treason" and "cowardice" involved in what the President would accomplish in one way and ex-President Roosevelt would accomplish in another way; but that may be charged to the exigencies of debate rather than to deliberate conviction.

These zealous champions do not seem to realize that history may link their names with the defenders of trusts and special privilege along with the authors and promoters of those subsidies and land grants whose baneful effects have accentuated the opposition to all subsidies. They fail to see that the words "ship subsidy" have a history; that like all special privileges it can not come in under its own name. It must hide behind a patriotic slogan or cover its face with the American flag to get even a hearing before the American people.

Conceding that all the Senators on this floor are guided by their conception of duty, I still cherish the hope that this legislative pill, now coated with the sugar of "patriotism," merchant-marine "glory," and "American interests and rights" will roll in the legislative mouth long enough to wash off the deceptive covering and reveal the bitter pill of ship subsidy that a trust would make us swallow.

The Senator from Kansas, in his discussion of this question, immediately following his reading of the provision of the act of August 24, 1912, which prohibits trust-controlled vessels from passing through the canal at all, makes use of the following vigorous language:

> The allegation of the "repealers" that free tolls benefits only a trust or monopoly is not an honest argument. The truth is that if railroad-owned and trust-controlled ships had not been barred from the canal we would never have had this repeal bill before us. That is where the shoe pinches and that is where this controversy started. This ingenious and dishonest argument had been used by designing men to confuse the public mind and cover up the real purpose of this bill, and many sincere and patriotic people have been misled by their declarations.

By any fair interpretation this would create the impression that the Senator meant that it should be believed that the present bill repeals the provision of that act which excludes trust-controlled ships from going through the canal. The Senator does not say so, and, of course, we all know that such is not the case. There has never been an effort in this body to repeal that provision of the act, and why the Senator would say or insinuate that the owners of these trust-controlled vessels are behind the present effort to repeal another clause of the act, which clause can not be applied to such trust-controlled vessels, appears rather strange. If the trust-controlled vessels can not go through the canal at all, how could they be interested in the question of tolls or exemption from tolls of their vessels which can not go through the canal? If self-interest could have any influence in the matter one way or the other, from the standpoint of trust-controlled ships, it might be to keep the present law providing for free ships, in order that the trust might work out of their hands in some way the vessels, or some of them which they now own. In my judgment, this only shows how an honest man can become so enthusiastic in a cause as to see in the point that is against him a ray of hope. It further shows the vice of never changing one's opinion. I want it distinctly understood in this record that this bill does not repeal that part of the act of 1912 which prohibits trust-controlled vessels from using the canal at all and under any circumstances. This is in harmony with the principles of the plan to curb trusts, over which the Congress has exclusive jurisdiction. If any international question shall rise in the enforcement of that provision, we can decide it when we come to it. The present act will have nothing to do with the decision of that question, however it might arise. In fact, as I have shown to my satisfaction, at least, this act can not be at any time and for any purpose used as a construction of the treaty.

Some interesting figures have been presented which the authors claim prove that at the election of 1912 all the votes cast for Wilson, Roosevelt, and Taft were registered for free tolls for coastwise ships. As I have tried to explain, this must be taken with the proviso that none of the people desired to violate a treaty and none of the Democrats wanted to grant a ship subsidy. I am confirmed in this opinion by the recent statement of ex-President Roosevelt favoring arbitration. He would arbitrate now. It is a part of the history of the act of 1912 that President Taft recommended that an amendment to that act be passed under which the controversy could be submitted to the Supreme Court. Therefore the case stands thus:

Ex-President Roosevelt would submit the case to The Hague court, ex-President Taft stood for a hearing before the Supreme Court, and President Wilson recommends an opening of the case in about the only way left to us to do so. The current use of the words "cowardice" and "surrender" makes no distinctions. The course of the two ex-Presidents is in the minds of the opponents of repeal as "cowardly" as the course of the President. Is it possible that the "free tollers" contemplate turning their backs upon all three of the great leaders and form a party of their own?

If we adopt ex-President Taft's position, we are subject to the criticism of choosing our own national tribunal for the decision of an international question. If we adopt ex-President Roosevelt's recommendation, we are bound to repeal the act of 1912, and that may be the policy of President Wilson, if the Congress shall agree with him.

But now there is nothing to arbitrate. We have hastily passed an act which is the law of the land. No matter what The Hague court might decide, that law binds our executive branch till amended or repealed by Congress. We can not submit anything in dispute to the Supreme Court now, because it is bound to enforce the act of 1912. So that, whether we agree with President Taft's recommendation in 1912, ex-President Roosevelt's recommendation now, or with President Wilson's message, the act of 1912 must be repealed. We are forbidden to take a forward step till we repeal or modify that act.

Mr. President, I do not want to evade what I am doing in favoring the repeal of the act of 1912. While I was ill, and was absent from the Senate by its leave, still I authorized my colleague to announce that, if present, I would vote for the bill, and I was paired in its favor.

This question was new to me then. But, regardless of my illness and my lack of information, I do not plead the "baby act," nor would I conceal the fact that I am about to vote to repeal a law which I helped to enact. But it would be a sad day whenever that course should be deemed impossible or improbable. There are few legislators who have not done so.

One who gets wrong is only a menace to righteousness; it is the one who persists in error who is dangerous and inexcusable. The Bible tells us that even the Maker of the heaven and earth "repented himself" of several things. History records that many of the great men of the world have, in following duty, changed their positions upon public questions. In my view of this matter, I could still favor free tolls for coastwise ships when the time comes that I might want to do so. I have tried to make clear that no good Democrat need blush that his party takes the older pledge for the new, or that it postpones the fulfillment of a pledge till that time when national obligations and honor will justify it.

We know as a party that "free tolls" in the abstract, or in the concrete, are viewed by the three leaders of the three leading parties from the same general standpoint—that is, that all would respect our treaty obligations. Now, what are our treaty obligations regarding the subject of tolls? Let us see what are the claims of Great Britain, and whether or not they can be brushed aside without consideration. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty is as follows:

> The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:
> The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;
> And His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;
> Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:
> "The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.
> "It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

"Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerents shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ARTICLE 4.

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

"In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and hereunto affixed their seals.

"Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1901.

"JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
"PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]"

This is the first time I have ever been called upon to construe a treaty. Acts of Congress and of State legislatures, deeds, wills, and written agreements I have often attempted to construe under the well-known rules laid down in the law books. As I understand a treaty it is a contract between nations and is to be construed by the same rules that the courts use in construing a contract between persons. The fundamental proposition of these rules as laid down is to arrive at the true intention of the parties. In doing this the law does not permit the courts to guess nor to go outside of the written instrument except, in cases of doubt, to get the surroundings of the parties and the relation of each to the subject matter, and this can be done only in those cases where the words would create an ambiguity. If the parties have written down their agreement in plain and unmistakable terms and the intention of the parties can be ascertained from what has been written down, then the courts can not substitute a more reasonable agreement or a more equitable agreement for the actual one already expressed in the writing. In other words, while the law desires to reach the true intention of the parties to an agreement it recognizes the right of the parties to write their own agreement, and where the minds have met and the writing is clear and unmistakable the parties are entitled to their own agreement and it is beyond the power of the courts to substitute another. I repeat that it is only in those cases in which the parties have been unfortunate in the use of terms, or in which the juxtaposition of sentences or terms makes it doubtful from the words used what the real intention of the parties may be, that the courts will go outside of the terms of the written paper to discover the true intention of the parties. The very purpose of the written agreement is to avoid a misunderstanding and the treachery of recollection. All things in the law proceed upon the theory of the honesty of the parties, a written agreement becoming a necessity in order that parties to transactions might be protected against death, failure of recollection, and any sort of misunderstanding.

If there be a law for the construction of treaties different from the law for the construction of any other contract, I would ignore it in the discussion of the treaty now before us for construction. I prefer to take up this treaty just as if it were a contract between two individuals, and this treaty were pleaded in an action at law or suit in equity, and upon demurrer the court were called upon to construe it and determine the question whether or not under the terms of this contract one of the parties to it is permitted to exempt its coastwise commerce from the payment of tolls through the Panama Canal. It seems to me that two things are settled beyond the shadow of a doubt. One is, that what is known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has been behind us ever since the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was ratified. Anything connected with that treaty can be of no use here except as an avenue to exploit learning. Article 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty wiped out the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and made it ancient history in all the relations between this Government and Great Britain. The language is as follows:

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

The English language could not express more clearly that the parties intended that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be a thing of the past, and should no more rise up to plague the high contracting parties.

The next proposition, which it seems to me is settled beyond a shadow of doubt, is that it was the intention of the parties to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that that instrument should express, and was meant to express, the agreement between the parties that no matter what might be the change in situation between the parties thereafter neither one could in good faith use that change as an excuse for receding from any contract or agreement expressed in that treaty. If I be correct in this proposition it will dispose of much of the argument made on this floor. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was an agreement between two sovereigns concerning an isthmian canal. It is clear from the treaty that both parties understood what the other was trying to do. Both understood the possibilities of each as to territorial aggrandizement, treaty obligations with other countries, and change in international relations and obligations. Therefore article 4 specifically provided that whatever might come as to any change in territorial sovereignty or international relations, no such thing should be thereafter offered as an excuse for a failure to keep the treaty. I quote article 4:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the aforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

Without going outside of the treaty, and without calling to our aid anything but its plain terms as expressed by the parties, it is perfectly clear that the United States understood that England might, through some international relations or change in territorial sovereignty of the Central American Republics, be put in a position from which she might claim that the treaty did not bind her; but it is more likely that England foresaw that the United States would in some way obtain title to or sovereignty over the strip of land through which she would thereafter build the canal, and England understood that in that event there would be those in the United States who would contend, just as it has been contended upon this floor, that the change in territorial sovereignty or international relations would justify the United States in breaking the treaty.

Article 4 was intended to prevent any such contention ever being made. It not only provides that any such event should not affect the "general principles of neutralization," but it also provides that that event should not affect "the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty." In other words, this clause of the treaty fortifies both parties against one of the principal arguments now being made in the Senate of the United States as a reason why this country is not bound by the treaty. I do not mean to reflect upon anyone else when I say that I can not give countenance to this theory. I am as loyal to the United States as anyone possibly could be, and I want her to have every right to which she is entitled. In any view of her domestic affairs—that is, whether she committed herself to the principle of ship subsidies or free tolls—I shall be guided by the ancient Democratic faith that a subsidy, like all other special privileges, has no place in a government attempting to give everyone equal opportunities; yet, as between ourselves and any foreign government, I would not throw away the right, if we have it, to subsidize American vessels, if it is the judgment of a majority of the people of this country that such a policy is best.

In our international relations there should be no politics. When we deal with a foreign Government our rights belong to all the people and should be preserved; but as an individual Senator here I am called upon to construe a treaty and to say by my vote what a written paper means. In doing this I am bound to preserve my intellectual integrity, and I can not be intellectually honest and at the same time say that article 4 of the treaty has any meaning or could be possibly construed by any fair-minded court as meaning anything except that we shall not hereafter claim anything on account of any change in territorial sovereignty or international relations of the country or countries traversed by the canal. We are bound to construe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty now just as we would have been bound to construe it if we had no title to the Canal Zone and no territorial sovereignty over it. We are bound to construe it as our international relations were at the time that treaty was ratified, because we have solemnly agreed that no change in any of these matters should affect our obligations under that treaty. Therefore, I shall eliminate from the discussion, so far as I am concerned, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and all change of territorial sovereignty or international relations which have taken place since the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was ratified. I do this because, if I had been called upon or were called upon now to write down in the English language an agreement that bound me to this course, I could not express it in more apt language than is expressed in the last-mentioned treaty. After reading and digesting article 1 and article 4 it seems to me that this Senate will eliminate about two-thirds of the discussion which has taken place upon this floor.

I have been at a loss to understand the force of the argument that inasmuch as there are six rules named as a basis of the neutralization of the canal, and because the last five of them are supposed not to apply to the United States, that for this reason the first one shall not so apply. It is a position in logic that I am not able to work out. I would not be surprised to find in a contract that one clause applied to one party and five clauses to another, or vice versa. I know of no reason and can conceive of no reason why parties to an agreement should not bind one of the parties in clause 1 and bind the other party entirely in five other clauses. Clause 1 of article 3 of the treaty, or rule No. 1 for the neutralization of the canal, is an agreement. It is written in the English language. It is part and parcel of an agreement entered into between England upon the one part and the United States upon the other. It was intended to express the solemn obligation of the United States concerning a great waterway.

If it binds us as a Nation to do a thing, we can not afford to taint our honor by refusing to do it. We ought to read this clause as we would read a contract between individuals, and, without quibbling or dodging, meet the issue, whatever it may be. This matter is being construed by the highest tribunal on earth, the enlightened judgment and the aroused conscience of the civilized world. In that forum there is no place for a dodger or a quibbler. There we shall be judged as a people and as a Nation, and patriots want us to stand in that enviable attitude that was expressed by Washington when he admonished us to live up to every international contract. His idea was to be slow to make international engagements, and then be most conscientious in living up to one already made. We can not, in deciding this question, afford to take the position of a litigant trying to get out from under the terms of a contract; but rather shall we, out in the broad light of day with the eyes of the world upon us, try to keep the place of an honest Christian nation, willing to construe our own contracts as they are and not as we would probably like to have them. Let us endeavor to get at our true intention from what our representatives said when they wrote the contract, and not from what we would like to have if we could write the contract again ourselves. In this spirit let us review clause 1 of article 3. It reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges shall be just and equitable.

The first words that strike our attention, and have been the subject of so much discussion, are the words "all nations." The average citizen of the United States, I take it, would have no trouble in construing the words "all nations" if he should find them in the State statutes, an act of Congress, a speech made upon the floor of the Senate, in a poem by Longfellow, in the resolutions of a political convention, or even on a tablet which Dr. Cook or Admiral Peary may have placed upon the North Pole. In the absence of something to explain, something to modify, something to change their ordinary meaning, "all" embraces every one. "All nations" would include the United States, and when England and the United States would use these two words they would embrace those two countries. In the oft-quoted expression, "All nations shall bow and all tongues shall confess" there can be no doubt what is meant.

When it is used in far-away China, China is not excepted; when it is used in the United States, the United States is not excepted. But we take the next clause, "on terms of entire equality." There the contracting parties use two words of strong import. There shall not only be equality as to all nations, but "entire equality." The contracting parties were not satisfied with using the words "all nations," but they went further and required that all nations should be on terms of entire equality. But they were not satisfied with this clear expression, and went further and used the following:

> So that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

They were not satisfied by saying that "all nations" should be embraced and that there should be "terms of entire equality," but they went further and provided that there should be "no discrimination against any such nation"; and then, to further show what was meant by the parties, they provided that the "citizens and subjects" of every nation should be on terms of equality, and that there should be no "discrimination" against its "citizens or subjects." And what kind of discrimination is meant? The treaty itself explains—"in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise." In other words, here are two parties making a contract regarding the use of a great waterway, and under that contract they provide for entire equality. They provided against discrimination, against discriminating against their citizens or subjects; and then, so as to be sure that no one could misconstrue those words, they provided that this equality and this immunity from discrimination shall go so far as to be the security and the privilege of every citizen and every subject of these nations, not only regarding their vessels of war and commerce, but "in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

It is not alone the tolls on vessels, but the "charges" for traffic and the "conditions of traffic" which are embraced; and then if that was not broad enough to embrace the equality and the immunity from discrimination which the parties have provided, they use the other expressions, "or otherwise," so as to take in every consideration which would affect any vessels or any cargo and its relation to any nation or to the citizens or subjects of any nation. I might ask here, what is not embraced in this solemn covenant? How could a purpose to put every citizen and every subject of every nation and every nation "on terms of entire equality" be more aptly expressed, and what language could be used from which there could be deduced the clear intention that there should be no right, privilege, immunity, or advantage for one nation or the citizens or subjects of any nation over the citizens or subjects of any other nation than are used in this clause of the treaty? But it does not stop there. It then puts a broad mantle of interpretation over all of it—"such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable." What does "just" mean? It means "right." It means "true," "fair," "without discrimination," without giving one any advantage over another. "Equitable" means "in the spirit of equity." Equity is a practice made necessary by the harshness of the common law. It was for the correction of those things wherein the law, by reason of its universality, was deficient. Equity courts are courts of conscience, into which the dishonest and contract-breaking litigant can not come. The primary principle of the courts of equity is that no one can come into them except with clean hands. He must come wanting to do right, to be fair. The treaty provides, and I want to lay especial stress upon the fact, that we shall not limit this last sentence of rule 1 to charges of traffic. It embraces as well "conditions of traffic." We can not dismiss this last sentence by saying that the charges of traffic through the canal shall be reasonable; that is, that we will not make the tolls too high, and that we will on the vessels and cargoes through which we collect tolls make them just and equitable from a transportation standpoint, and make no discrimination as between citizens and subjects of different nations. We bound ourselves in this treaty to make "conditions of traffic just and equitable," which means that we ought in the court of the world, out in the open, where conscience and good faith must obtain, make the operation of that canal just and equitable, so far as the conditions of traffic as well as the charges of traffic may be concerned. If we are the "dictator" of charges, we could levy an "inequitable" toll or an "unjust" toll. However, we promised never to be unjust and never to be blind to equity.

Now, what is meant by the term "conditions of traffic"? Shall we stand here and say that it has a restricted or a narrow meaning? Shall we be surprised that England, our neighbor, and a friendly nation, respectfully asks us to embrace her and her vessels in every consideration of the construction of these rules? Is it any wonder that she should say that a cargo which she started from Halifax, Nova Scotia, to go to San Francisco by way of the Panama Canal, shall be treated in a different way from a cargo which shall start from Boston to go to San Francisco through the canal? That is traffic; that is commerce. We take our cargo from Boston in a vessel of commerce and England takes hers in a vessel of commerce. England proposes to observe our rules, and if she does we have contracted with her that those two cargoes shall go on "terms of entire equality." We have solemnly agreed with her that, regarding that cargo, there shall be no "discrimination" against her and no discrimination against her "citizens" nor against her "subjects." We have solemnly agreed that this entire equality and this absence of discrimination shall be in respect not only to the "charges of traffic," but the "conditions of traffic." Are we now surprised as a self-respecting, honest Nation that England should claim that we are discriminating against her when we take to the same market, and go practically over the same route, and yet we have so fixed "conditions and charges of traffic" that we will take our cargo to this common market at a less charge than she can get hers there? Shall we be surprised when she says that that is not "entire equality"? Is it amazing that she should say that this looks like discrimination against her and her subjects? Shall we think it something terrible that this friendly nation shall protest that this course of ours is making the conditions or the charges of traffic harder on her subjects than it is on ours? Should we marvel that the English people say that these conditions or charges of traffic are not just and not equitable under this clause of the treaty? Is it treason, is it cowardice, that a Senator's intellectual honesty compels him at this point to pause and see what he would do if he were concerned as a judge to decide this momentous question?

If we are to be perfectly fair and just in discussing this question, we must realize that the condition here now is not what will be the final outcome of this controversy, but what is our present duty. We are trying to determine what is the right course in dealing with a friendly nation at the present time, because this is a controversy between nations, and we can not settle it here unless we say that we will doggedly and arbitrarily pursue our own course and what we may conceive to be our own rights without consulting the other party to the agreement. In other words, we must try to put ourselves in England's place at the present time. The real question is what would we do if the positions were changed, and what would be our conception of our duty as a nation if we at this time occupied England's position regarding the canal, because we are asked now to say that England has no rights concerning this matter, that she is an interloper, that we will decide all controverted points in our own favor, enter judgment and issue execution, and will not discuss the question with the other party to the contract. In determining what would be the natural position of England on this subject we ought to recollect what we have said and what we have done as bearing upon this question. From the report made by Senator Davis, of Minnesota, to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations recommending the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty I take the following extracts:

[Extract from the report of Senator Davis, of Minnesota, from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, recommending the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.]

That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practical, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all.

That the United States would not if they could obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belongs to all mankind.

That while they aim at no exclusive privilege for themselves, they could never consent to see so important a communication fall under the exclusive control of any other great commercial power.

If, however, the British Government shall reject these overtures on our part, and shall refuse to cooperate with us in the generous and philanthropic scheme of rendering the interoceanic communication by the way of the port and river San Juan free to all nations upon the same terms, we shall deem ourselves justified in protecting our interest independently of aid and despite her opposition or hostility.

It was an explicit and peremptory demand for an agreement that would give to Nicaragua the freedom of exit to the sea through the San Juan River for a ship canal that should be open to all nations on equal terms and protected by an agreement of perfect neutrality.

In the origin of our claim to the right of way for our people and our produce, armies, mails, and other property through the canal, we offer to dedicate the canal to the equal use of mankind.

As to neutrality and the exclusive control of the canal and its dedication to universal use, the suggestions that were incorporated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty came from the United States and were concurred in by Great Britain. In no instance has the Government of the United States intimated an objection to this treaty on account of the features of neutrality, its equal and impartial use by all other nations.

Thus the United States from the beginning, before the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, took the same ground that is reached in the convention of February, 1900, for the universal decree of the neutral, free, and innocent use of the canal as a worldly highway, where war should not exist and where the honor of all nations would be a safer protection than fortresses for its security. From that day to this these wise forecasts have been fulfilled, and Europe has adopted in the convention of Constantinople the same great safeguard for the canal that was projected by Mr. Cass in 1857.

No American statesman, speaking with official authority or responsibility, has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war and always open on terms of impartial equity to the ships and commerce of the world.

Special treaties for the neutrality, impartiality, freedom, and innocent use of the two canals that are to be the eastern and western gateways of commerce between the two great oceans are not in keeping with the magnitude and universality of the blessings they must confer upon mankind. The subject rather belongs to the domain of international law.

The leading powers of Europe recognized the importance of this subject in respect of the Suez Canal, and ordained a public international act for its neutralization that is an honor to the civilization of the age. It is the beneficent work of all Europe and not of Great Britain alone. Whenever a canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien, it will be ultimately made subject to the same law of freedom and neutrality as governs the Suez Canal, as a part of the laws of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control.

The European powers gave to this subject the greatest consideration, and reached conclusions that are not open to criticism as being unjust to any nation in the world. Turkey and Egypt, the imperial and the local sovereigns of the canal, and Great Britain, a controlling stockholder in the Maritime Canal Co., had special interests in the rules for regulating the use of the canal, and they united in the convention which deprived them of exceptional privileges in its navigation, in peace and in war, for the sake of justice to all maritime nations and the peace and prosperity of the world.

No nation disapproves of this great act or has had grounds of complaint against it. No American will ever be found to complain of it. It is right in its moral features, in its impartiality, and, above all, in its tendency to decrease the resort to war for the settlement of international quarrels, and will have the cordial approval of the American people.

The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 22, 1888, without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of an isthmian canal and its equal use by all nations, without discrimination.

To set up the selfish motive of gain by establishing a monopoly of a highway that must derive its income from the patronage of all maritime countries would be unworthy of the United States if we owned the country through which the canal is to be built.

But the location of the canal belongs to other Governments, from whom we must obtain any right to construct a canal on their territory, and it is not unreasonable, if the question was new and was not involved in a subsisting treaty with Great Britain, that she should question the right of even Nicaragua and Costa Rica to grant to our ships of commerce and of war extraordinary privileges of transit through the canal.

It is not reasonable to suppose that Nicaragua and Costa Rica would grant to the United States the exclusive control of a canal through those States on terms less generous to the other maritime nations than those prescribed in the great act of October 22, 1888; or if we could compel them to give us such advantages over other nations it would not be creditable to our country to accept them.

That our Government or our people will furnish the money to build the canal presents the single question whether it is profitable to do so. If the canal, as property, is worth more than its cost, we are not called on to divide the profits with other nations. If it is worth less, and we are compelled by national necessities to build the canal, we have no right to call on other nations to make up the loss to us. In any view, it is a venture that we will enter upon if it is to our interest, and if it is otherwise we will withdraw from its further consideration.

The Suez Canal makes no discrimination in its tolls in favor of its stockholders, and, taking its profits or the half of them as our basis of calculation, we will never find it necessary to differentiate our rates of toll in favor of our own people in order to secure a very great profit on the investment.

In this convention we stipulate against the blockade of the canal by any nation.

In conditions that may not be entirely remote we would find this provision, in letting our ships through the canal free from capture by our enemy, of great security to our coastwise trade.

The Suez Canal is in the same situation, and none of the European powers would have it otherwise, because it is to the interest of all nations that war shall not exist in or near the canal, and it is made a national crime for any nation to violate the neutral ground. No nation is willing to incur universal hostility by violating the sanctity of waters in which all have equal rights.

But the canal is not dedicated to war but to peace, and whatever shall better secure just and honorable peace is a triumph.

In time of war as in time of peace the commerce of the world will pass through its portals in perfect security, enriching all nations, and we of the English-speaking people will either forget that this grand work has ever cost us a day of bitterness, or we will rejoice that our contentions have delayed our progress until the honor has fallen to our grand Republic to number this among our best works for the good of mankind.

When the second treaty was submitted to the Senate, Secretary of State Hay said:

The United States alone, as the sole owner of the canal, as a purely American enterprise, adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing, without the assistance of Great Britain or of any other nation, its absolute neutrality.

Representative STEVENS of Minnesota has given the following statements from our own public men, indicating our general purpose to see to it that no discrimination should be allowed in the use of the canal:

Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Anderson and Sergeant, United States representatives to the Panama Congress, May 8, 1826:

"A cut or a canal for purposes of navigation somewhere through the Isthmus that connects the two Americas to unite the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans will form a proper subject of consideration at the congress. That vast object, if it should be ever accomplished, will be interesting in a greater or less degree to all parts of the world. But to this continent will probably accrue the largest amount of benefit from its execution, and to Colombia, Mexico, the Central Republic, Peru, and the United States more than to any other of the American nations. What is to redound to the advantage of all America should be effected by common means and united exertions and should not be left to the separate and unassisted efforts of any one power. * * * If the work should ever be executed so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls."

Senate resolution, 1835:

"* * * The construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever by such stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations. * * *"

House resolution, 1839:

"* * * For the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations."

Treaty of 1846:

"* * * Any modes of communication that now exist, or that may be hereafter constructed, shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States, and for the transportation of any articles of produce, manufactures, or merchandise of lawful commerce belonging to the citizens of the United States; that no other tolls or charges shall be levied or collected upon the citizens of the United States, or their said merchandise thus passing over any road or canal that may be made by the Government of New Granada, or by the authority of the same, than is, under like circumstances, levied upon and collected from the Granadian citizens. * * *"

President Polk's message:

"It will constitute no alliance for any political object, but for a purely commercial purpose in which all the navigating nations of the world have a common interest.

"In entering upon mutual guaranties proposed by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty, neither the Government of New Granada nor that of the United States has any narrow or exclusive views. The ultimate object, as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution of March 3, 1835, to which I have already referred, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus."

Secretary of State Lewis Cass:

"While the rights of sovereignty of the local governments must always be respected, other rights also have arisen in the progress of events involving interests of great magnitude to the commercial world, and demanding its careful attention and, if need be, its efficient protection. In view of these interests and after having invited capital and enterprise from other countries to aid in the opening in these great highways of nations under pledges of free transit to all desiring it, it can not be permitted that these Governments should exercise over them an arbitrary and unlimited control, or close them or embarrass them without reference to the wants of commerce or the intercourse of the world. Equally disastrous would it be to leave them at the mercy of every nation which, in time of war, might find it advantageous for hostile purposes to take possession of them and either restrain their use or suspend it altogether.

"The President hopes that by the general consent of the maritime powers all such difficulties may be prevented, and the interoceanic lines, with the harbors of immediate approach to them, may be secured beyond interruption to the great purposes for which they were established."

See Seward in note to Minister Adams, 1862:

"This Government has no interest in the matter different from that of other maritime powers. It is willing to interpose its aid in execution of its treaty and further equal benefit of all nations."

In a note to the Colombian minister, January 18, 1869, Secretary Seward expressed himself in the same manner.

Negotiations of Secretary of State Fish:

"* * * A Darien Canal should not be regarded as hostile to a Suez Canal; they will be not so much rivals as joint contributors to the increase of the commerce of the world, and thus mutually advance each other's interests. * * *

"We shall * * * be glad of any movement which shall result in the early decision of the question of the most practicable route and the early commencement and speedy completion of an interoceanic communication, which shall be guaranteed in its perpetual neutralization and dedication to the commerce of all nations, without advantages to one over another of those who guarantee its assured neutrality. * * *

"* * * the benefit of neutral waters at the ends thereof for all classes of vessels entitled to fly their respective flags, with the cargoes on board, on equal terms in every respect as between each other. * * *"

Secretary of State Blaine's instructions to Mr. Lowell:

"* * * Nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees, and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time, in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located, that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal, shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe; and equally in time of peace the harmless use of the canal shall be freely granted to the war vessels of other nations. * * *"

Lord Granville's reply:

"* * * such communication concerned not merely the United States or the American Continent, but, as was recognized by article 6 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the whole civilized world, and that she would not oppose or decline any discussion for the purpose of securing on a general international basis its universal and unrestricted use. * * *"

President Cleveland's message, 1885:

"* * * Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit—a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition. * * *"

"* * * These suggestions may serve to emphasize what I have already said on the score of the necessity of a neutralization of any interoceanic transit; and this can only be accomplished by making the uses of the route open to all nations and subject to the ambitions and warlike necessities of none."

Secretary of State Olney's memorandum, 1896:

"* * * That the interoceanic routes there specified should, under the sovereignty of the States traversed by them, be neutral and free to all nations alike.

"* * * Under these circumstances, upon every principle which governs the relations to each other, either by nations or of individuals, the United States is completely estopped from denying that the treaty is in full force and vigor."

Message of President Roosevelt in submitting treaty:

"* * * It specifically provides that the United States alone shall do the work of building and assume the responsibility of safeguarding the canal, and shall regulate its neutral use by all nations on terms of equality without the guaranty of interference of any outside nation from any quarter."

President Roosevelt's special message, January 4, 1904:

"* * * Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was explicitly provided that the United States should control, police, and protect the canal which was to be built, keeping it open for the vessels of all nations on equal terms. The United States thus assumes the position of guarantor of the canal and of its peaceful use by all the world."

Secretary of State Hay's note of January 5, 1904:

"* * * The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was conceived to form an obstacle, and the British Government therefore agreed to abrogate it, the United States only promising in return to protect the canal and keep it open on equal terms to all nations in accordance with our traditional policy."

It can thus be seen that the provisions in the treaty are in accord with what the statesmen of this country have set forth as the intention and the purpose of the United States in building the canal, and we should not be surprised at this point, when the cocontracting parties ask for a construction of the treaty, and in a perfectly friendly and respectful way asks us to pause and decide, as a Christian nation should decide, what the treaty means before we enter upon a policy which England claims is in violation of the terms of the treaty. Let us pursue this investigation a little further. England would have the right to claim that for another ground we have been mistaken in our construction of this treaty, and it is worthy of our consideration. It bears directly upon the question what the words "all nations" mean. As I have before laid down, it is the golden rule in construing contracts that every part of the paper must be given a meaning, and where any clause may be doubtful such a construction of that clause must be given, if possible, as to make it harmonize with every other part of the written paper. This is so fundamentally the law of construction of contracts that it is hardly worth while to go to the law books, but this is a question of such importance that I will quote from some authorities to sustain the rules which I shall apply in the construction of this treaty.

INTERPRETATION AND CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACTS.

The elementary canon of interpretation is, not that particular words may be isolatedly considered, but that the whole contract must be brought into view and interpreted with reference to the nature of the obligations between the parties and the intention which they have manifested in forming them. (168 U. S., 287; 163 U. S., 564; 149 U. S., 1; 159 U. S., 526; 143 U. S., 596.)

The contract must receive a reasonable construction, so as to carry the intention of the parties into effect. (186 U. S., 279.)

The universal rule is that where a contract will bear two constructions equally consistent with its language, one of which will render it operative and the other void, the former will be preferred. (118 U. S., 235; 9 Wall., 394; 117 U. S., 567.)

It is against the rules, both of law and of reason, to admit by implication in the construction of a contract a principle which goes in destruction of it. (Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S., 432.)

The contract must be so construed as to give meaning to all its provisions, and that interpretation would be incorrect which would obliterate one portion of the contract in order to enforce another part thereof. (Burden Cent. Sugar Ref. Co. v. Payne, 167 U. S., 127.)

In construing contracts words are to receive their plain and literal meaning. (Caldron v. Atlas Steamship Co., 170 U. S., 272.)

Courts in the construction of contracts may avail themselves of the same light which the parties enjoyed when the contract was executed. They are accordingly entitled to place themselves in the same situation as the parties who made the contract, in order that they may view the circumstances as those parties viewed them and so judge of the meaning of the words and of the correct application of the language to the things described. (Wash. v. Towne, 5 Wall., 689; Goddard v. Foster, 17 Wall., 123; Moran v. Prather, 23 Wall., 492.)

Judge Story, in the case of The Amiable Isabella (U. S. Sup. Ct., 1821, 6 Wheat., 1), says:

This court does not possess any treaty-making power. That power belongs by the Constitution to another department of the Government; and to alter, amend, or add to any treaty by inserting any clause, whether small or great, important or trivial, would be on our part a usurpation of power and not an exercise of judicial functions. It would be to make and not to construe a treaty. Neither can this court supply a casus omissus in a treaty. We are to find out the intention of the parties by just rules of interpretation applied to the subject matter, and having found that, our duty is to follow it as far as it goes, and to stop where that stops, whatever may be the imperfections or difficulties which it leaves behind. The parties who formed this treaty, and they alone, have a right to annex the form of the passport. It is a high act of sovereignty, as high as the formation of any other stipulation of the treaty. It is a matter of negotiation between the Governments. The treaty does not leave it to the discretion of either party to annex the form of passport; it requires it to be the joint act of both, and that act is to be expressed by both parties in the only manner known between independent nations by a solemn compact through agents specially delegated and by a formal ratification.

In the construction of a treaty its language must control and can not be varied by any notion of justice or convenience. (6 Wheat., 1; 92 U. S., 733; 179 U. S., 494.)

Where no exception is made in terms, none can be made by mere implication or construction. (Rhode Island v. Mass., 12 Pet., 657, 722; U. S. v. Choctaw Nation, 179 U. S., 94.)

A treaty is to be liberally construed. (Shanks v. Dupont, 3 Ret., 242; Hanenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S., 48; Ward v. Race Horse, 163 U. S., 504.)

The meaning of a treaty is to be ascertained by the same rules of construction as are applicable to the interpretation of a private contract. (183 U. S., 424; 6 Ret., 691; 9 How., 127; 10 How., 609.)

In the construction of a treaty the entire instrument is to be considered and that construction given it which gives a sensible meaning to all its provisions. (United States v. Texas, 162 U. S., 136; Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S., 258; In re Ross, 140 U. S., 453.)

A compact between nations, like those between individuals, is to be interpreted according to the natural, fair, and received acceptation of the terms in which it is expressed. (United States v. D'Anterive, 10 How., 609; United States v. Reynes, 9 How., 127; Davis v. Police Jury, 9 How., 280.)

A treaty is to be construed in the light of the facts and circumstances surrounding its making. (In re Ross, 140 U. S., 453; Owings v. Norwood, 5 Cranch, 344.)

A treaty is to be construed with reference to the contracting parties, the subject matter, and persons on whom it is to operate. (United States v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 691; Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S., 258.)

A convention which is operative upon both contracting nations and intended for their mutual protection is to be interpreted in a spirit of uberrima fides. (Tucker v. Alexanderoff, 183 U. S., 424.)

It is a fundamental rule that in the construction of contracts if the language is doubtful, the courts, in ascertaining the meaning of the parties, especially as to the subject matter, should look not only to the language employed but to the subject matter, the conduct and situation of the parties as between themselves and with relation to the subject matter, and the surrounding facts and circumstances, and may avail themselves of the same light which the parties possessed when the contract was made. The transaction must necessarily be held to have been entered into with the intention to produce its natural result. (Vol. 4, Encyl. Dig. U. S. Sup. Ct., p. 570, and numerous cases cited.)

Every contract ought to be so construed that no clause, sentence, or word shall be superfluous, void, or insignificant. Every word ought to operate in some shape or other; one part must be so construed with another that the whole may, if possible, stand; but a clause or particular sentence totally repugnant to the general intent of the contract is void and must be rejected. The terms of the contract are to be understood in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense, unless they have generally, in respect to the subject matter, as by the known usage of trade or the like, acquired a peculiar sense distinct from the popular sense of the same words. (Addison's Law of Contracts, 7th ed., p. 45.)

Another rule is that every contract is to be construed with reference to its object and the whole of its terms, and accordingly the whole context must be considered in endeavoring to collect the intention of the parties. (Chitty on Contracts, 15th ed., p. 97.)

As I gather the rule from these authorities it is that in construing a written instrument the lodestar is to arrive at the intention of the parties from what they have written down in the paper if it be possible to do so. We are not justified in disregarding anything that is written down in the paper, and all that the parties have stipulated in writing shall be given a meaning, and from everything that is written we must, if possible, arrive at the true intention of the parties. There is another golden rule of construction, and that is that where words can be given one meaning, if interpreted one way, and by that interpretation of the words they will be in harmony with all other parts of the paper, then such a construction shall be given to the words rather than another which would not be in harmony with other parts of the agreement. We are now construing the meaning of the words "all nations," and I desire to apply these rules to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is said by those against the repeal of the present law that the United States is in the position of a grantor; that in article 3 of the treaty it is granting something to the other nations of the world, and therefore it is to be exempted. I am bound to admit that on the first statement of this proposition it carries some force. Notwithstanding the clear language which rule 1 contains, if it be true that the United States is the grantor, is the lord paramount, and was expressing to the world the rules by which it would permit the nations of the earth to use the canal, there is force in this argument. But it can be said, in answer, that England is also a grantor. We derive our right to make rules by the same treaty. It is a give-and-take instrument, for both parties give and take. Our Government confessed its inability to construct the canal, as it has, without the treaty. Therefore this argument may appear to the world as the position of the litigant, not the argument of the judge. Is it a forceful broad reason that will strike the intellect of the world, or is it an excuse or expedient of a litigant trying to gain an advantage? Let us talk plainly about these very important matters, because the world will talk about them. Our position before the nations of the earth is a greater stake than the little pecuniary advantage that might be obtained. Is this really the broad lawyer's argument or is it an expedient under which we hope to gain our point whether right or wrong? In looking at England's standpoint, what she will say and what she will argue, and in viewing the world's standpoint upon this question, we must be careful that our contentions are reasons and not excuses. We must be sure that our point will be justified by the court of last resort which decides whether or not we are treaty breakers or treaty keepers, and with that in view I want to analyze this part of the treaty.

Article 2 provides that the canal may be constructed under the "auspices" of the United States. It then goes on to provide that we may build it in the following ways: First, directly at our own cost; second, by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations; and, third, through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares.

We chose to take the first way provided in the treaty—that is, we built it at our own cost—and now, because we chose that way, should we construe the words "all nations" as if that mode of building the canal had been the only mode provided for in the treaty; and, having chosen that mode, shall we call ourselves the lord paramount, the grantor, the giver, in construing the rules set forth in article 3? Suppose that instead of building this canal at our own cost we had given or loaned the money to individuals or corporations to build it. Suppose we had loaned the money to that old French company and it had gone forward and constructed the canal, what would have been our position? We could have reserved a lien upon all of the property, rights, and franchises of the canal company for the repayment of our loan and its interest. We would have had the right of regulation and management of the canal provided for in article 2. We could have reserved the enjoyment of "all the rights incident to such construction" as provided in article 2, but could we in that event have said that certain vessels of ours should be exempt from tolls? Upon what theory could we have done so? The canal company would certainly have a right to make a fair return upon its money. It would have had the right to insist that the charges of traffic should be just and equitable. Why? Because it is provided under the treaty that a corporation might build it or that individuals might build it. That presupposes a right to make an investment that would bring a return, a just and equitable return, to the stockholders. That corporation would have had a right, in that event, to have insisted that this Government should not take its property without due process of law. In other words, having provided that a corporation could build the canal, we must construe the words "all nations" as those words would reasonably present themselves to all the parties concerned in the event that the canal had been built by the old French company under a loan from this Government.

We violate a fundamental principle of construction of the paper when we disregard the condition that the canal might have been built by that corporation and not directly by this Government. In the contingency just named the words "all nations" in the treaty must be construed from the standpoint of the corporation which built the canal. The rights of the stockholders of that corporation would have been bound up in the general proposition that our rules could not deprive it of its property, its tolls, without due process of law; and would also be bound up in the stipulation that "all nations" should enter the canal on terms of entire equality; that there should be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise; and that corporation would have had the right to insist that the charges of traffic should be just and equitable to it as well as just and equitable among all the nations of the earth. But let us suppose another condition that might confront us at this time. Suppose that the third manner of building the canal had been adopted; that is, through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares. Suppose that the Panama Canal Co., the old French company, had revived and reorganized and had sold some of its shares to England, Germany, France, Belgium, Italy, Greece, Austria, China, and Japan, and some to the United States. This plan would have been perfectly feasible and would have been within the terms of article 2 of the treaty. The language "through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares" is very broad and is consistent with our right to regulate and manage the canal and that it should be built under our "auspices." If a corporation had been organized to build the canal and we proceeded to exercise the authority given by article 2, to wit, "the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal," could we in all fairness raise the argument that we are the grantor and that we are the lord paramount of the canal and the Canal Zone and that the words "all nations" referred to all the other stockholders in the canal except ourselves?

In construing the words "all nations," I repeat, we must so construe them as to give them a meaning if the canal had been built in any of the three ways provided for in article 2. In the contingency last mentioned we would have had the anomaly that the nations of the earth, being stockholders in the canal, when we came to construe the meaning of the words "all nations" we would construe them to mean all stockholders except ourselves; and we as stockholders would claim the right to put our vessels through the canal free of charge and make all the other nations of the earth pay a just and equitable toll so as to pay dividends upon our own stock.

Now, in all seriousness, I ask again, is that argument that we are the grantors, and are excluded from the term "all nations" for that reason, in the light of these other conditions which might have been adopted for the building of the canal, an argument or an expedient? Is it a reason or an excuse? How will that great court of conscience of the enlightened civilized world take that argument? Will it put us in the position of contending for our rights or of trying to find an excuse to avoid the terms of the treaty? Therefore I contend that the words "all nations," at the very best that we can possibly claim for ourselves as a nation, may in a court without prejudice and without the prompting of self-interest be construed to include us. There are certainly weighty arguments on that side of the question. "A decent respect for the opinions of mankind" compels us to admit this; and therefore we should not undertake to stop the argument, to decide the case in which we are interested, in our own way, and seize the benefits of that interpretation without consulting the other side to the argument and without treating the request of England in the way that we would expect the same kind of request to be treated were the situation of the parties reversed. The record of this debate will have many points of argument based upon the proposition that by opposing this repeal act we surrender forever the rights of the United States. This has been repeated and repeated, notwithstanding the fact that all of us know that one Congress can not bind the other. All of us thoroughly understand that it is not the intention of those who would vote for the repeal of this act to do anything of the kind. There was adopted by a majority vote of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals the proviso offered by the senior Senator from North Carolina, in the following language: "Provided, That neither the passage of this act nor anything therein contained shall be construed or held as waiving, impairing, or affecting any treaty or other right possessed by the United States."

There can be no sort of doubt that this proviso will be a part of the repealing act, if it shall be passed at all. I take it that every Senator here who will vote for the repeal of this act will also vote that the bill contain this proviso. So far as I am personally concerned, I have little doubt that the repeal of the act of 1912 would not commit us to a permanent construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; but I do not want a repetition of the condition brought about by the defeat of the Bard amendment to that treaty. So far as I am concerned, I want us to say what we mean, and that is that we are not construing the treaty at all. We are simply showing the world that we know how to be fair; that we know how to deal with the civilized nations of the earth; that we respect our obligations; that we are sensitive of our honor; and that, at best, the matter is susceptible of debate; and we are willing to go into any forum, willing to carry this matter before the enlightened judgment of the world, and, let come what may, we are prepared to do the right thing; and if, by diplomacy, arbitration, or in any other way, we have the right to free tolls through the canal, whether we exercise the right hereafter or not, we want to preserve it. If we have not the right, we want it to be decided in some way that is just and fair and let the matter be settled forever. There is no use for anyone to try to put us in any other light. We are willing to confer, debate, and treat upon this question, and do not intend to take advantage of the great trust committed to our charge and take a selfish advantage. We are conceding no rights, and say so in the proviso. We are giving away nothing to which we may be entitled. We are making all of that clear. We simply say that we do not intend to put ourselves in the attitude of having a matter of dispute with a friendly power, and, without hearing fully from the other side, proceed to decide the case in our own favor and then appropriate the subject matter of dispute to our own use.

A great deal has been said in this debate over the provision, "This Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

They are sweet words when taken by themselves, and might be used as a basis for claiming anything for ourselves under the treaty. Like the claim that we are lord proprietors of the canal, that we stand in the relation of grantors as to the clause enunciated, they can by this be made the basis for doing almost anything that we please under the treaty. We forget, however, that the provision giving us all the rights incident to the construction and the right to regulate and manage the canal, as well as our claim to be the proprietor and our claim to be the grantor, are all made in article 2, "subject to the provisions of the present treaty." Whatever we may claim for article 3, everything in it is an agreement to which there are two parties. It is in one sense a recital, and England will insist, and she may have the right to insist, that all the clauses in article 3, exactly as our claim of the right to enjoy everything incident to the construction of the canal, shall be subject to the treaty. All of us are familiar with logging contracts, under which one of the parties agrees to deliver logs and timber and the other agrees to buy the logs and timber. It is quite usual in these contracts to provide that some rule for measuring logs shall obtain. In my country they usually provide that Doyle's rule shall govern. It is sometimes set forth at length in the contracts, and sometimes it is referred to generally. The man who is to measure the timber agrees that he will be bound by Doyle's rule, for instance, for measurements. This does not mean that the party adopting these measurement rules has any rights not prescribed by the rules. It does not mean that he is in any better position or any worse position by adopting rules than he would be if every condition of the measurement of the timber had been named in the contract. The words in the treaty, "The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say" are claimed seriously on this floor to modify or qualify the six clauses. I can not for the life of me see what can be gained by deciding what is the meaning of the word "neutralization" as used in these introductory words. We must look at the six clauses themselves and see what they mean.

The United States adopted them. Why? Because in article 2 the Government of the United States was given the right, "subject to the provisions of the present treaty," to provide for the regulation and management of the canal, and England was unwilling to accept the treaty unless the rules by which it should be managed should be set forth in the treaty. Out of respect to the United States the form was adopted of having the United States name or specify what those rules should be. They were written down in the treaty and agreed to by both parties. The form in which they are written in the treaty makes no difference. The fact that they were put in the treaty shows that they suited both parties, and the treaty would not have been ratified if they had not suited both parties. They have the same force and effect as if the introductory words had never been used. It is recited that they are substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, not for the "neutralization" of the Suez Canal, but for the "free navigation" of the Suez Canal. If there should be in the rules following a variance from the convention of Constantinople which would be against the provisions of the rules, clearly the recital can not be used to contradict a plain agreement of one of the parties. By using the word "substantially" we get the general intention. In other words, the idea I mean to convey is this: That because the word "neutralization" is used in the introductory language some have chosen to say that it was the intention of the parties to modify the set of rules following. This argument taken to its logical conclusion would make the word "neutralization" stronger than the words "free navigation" and outweigh all of the specific rules that follow. To illustrate further what I mean: Suppose that after the word "nations" in rule 1 there had been inserted the words "including the United States," then it would read that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations, including the United States, observing these rules on terms of entire equality," and so forth. Then, what force could possibly be given to the word "neutralization" and the meaning thereof contended for by advocates of free tolls? It is illustrative of the doctrine that a specific provision must outweigh the recital or general introductory words. Suppose that a seventh clause had been added in the broad language that the United States shall be included within these rules, then all talk of neutralization and the meaning of it would clearly have no place in this discussion. If the word "neutralization" is strong enough to make the words "all nations" exclude the United States, then anything else thereafter used to show a contrary intent would not have sufficed. Logic that confounds itself is not logic. We can not easily get away from the well-settled rule that the specific provisions of this treaty are the specific promises or agreements entered into by the parties to the treaty, and they must be so construed. The meaning of each word and sentence must be arrived at.

The treaty must be read as a whole and the intention of the parties must be ascertained; and we can not hide ourselves behind expedients and excuses to avoid the plain language of any provision. I have given my idea of what will be and what could be the contentions of Great Britain. I am giving what would be some of my contentions if the United States now stood in the same attitude toward England that she stands toward us. Whether these be sound or unsound, whether in the end they shall be decided against Great Britain or not, they all go to show that two honest men can differ as to the construction of this treaty. They show me further that, in all probability, if I were not a citizen of the United States I would, if called upon to decide this question, feel that the argument was rather in her favor than against her. Indeed, when we consider all of the arguments and take the treaty by its four corners, as the law books require, and construe it as a whole, I feel that the probabilities are that, on a fair construction of the treaty, we can not claim the right to exempt any of our vessels or traffic from the payment of tolls; but we are not called upon to go that far, and until called upon to decide that question I am willing to present the arguments as I see them upon both sides and let it rest.

But from an economic standpoint it looks to me as if the act of 1912 is a mistake. I fear it is, and the investigation which I have so far made has rather strengthened than alleviated that fear. If the agitation of the last few years has been directed at any one thing more than another it has been at graft and special privileges. I feel that there is an abiding conviction in the minds of the people that no special right or immunity or privilege taken away from all the people and given to a few of the people can in the end be best for the country. It stimulates inordinate greed, is calculated to create wealthy classes, and burdens business and the consumer in the long run. It assuredly is not wise for one generation to grant special privileges when we know that the next generation must take up the burden of getting rid of them. When we recall that the coastwise trade of the United States is almost entirely in the hands of a combination of shipowners, as has been shown by an investigation made under the auspices of one branch of the Government, the force of this thought is accentuated. What is there about the Shipping Trust or about a business which can easily become a trust to distinguish it from the railroad business, the oil business, the steel business, or any other kind of business which is so liable to drift into the hands of a few? The junior Senator from New York estimates that these tolls will not amount, in all probability, to more than $1,200,000 by one calculation which he made, and that calculation is based upon the fact that, excluding the railroad-owned vessels, which the act of 1912 does, there will be left to go through the canal only tonnage that will yield about that sum. We should not allow $1,200,000, or even $12,000,000 to make us violate principles which our experience has taught us are vital to orderly government. It will cost this Government many more millions in the long run to grant any one business a subsidy or special privilege, no matter how small it may be. Its example, its educational force, will cost us untold sums.

But let us look at this question from another standpoint. We have various treaties with foreign nations which may be affected by our position if we decide for free tolls. A Member of Congress has tabulated these treaties, and they may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 6, 1914, page 5691. He gives a list of 20 of these treaties, and in every one of them there is a clause exempting the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls, showing that it is the custom to make this specific exception in treaties when dealing with vessels and commerce if the intention is to exempt it. For instance, under the treaty with Nicaragua dated December 1, 1884, the provision is "equal tolls for the vessels of all nations." but there is added "except the vessels of the contracting parties engaged in the coastwise trade." An examination of these treaties will, I think, demonstrate the proposition that when we use the term "all nations" or any provisions showing that there shall be no discrimination, and it is the further purpose to except domestic commerce or the coastwise trade, the exception is made in specific language. We are deeply interested in this question from our present position regarding other treaties. We have treaties which affect the lake trade to the north of us. The volume of this commerce is very large. The Soo Canal alone last year passed about 80,000,000 tons of commerce, and it has been estimated that more than 90 per cent of this is American commerce. It has been estimated that the Welland Canal alone, only 14 feet in depth, will carry more American traffic than our entire coastwise traffic which will pass through the Panama Canal, and yet we have, by the act of 1912, made a precedent without realizing the fact that we have scores of treaties where practically this same language has been used, and there may be applied to these treaties the construction which we placed upon the treaty by the act of 1912, and which construction will justify foreign Governments in using against us our own rule, and which affect many, many times more than the amount of commerce that will go through the Panama Canal. We should appreciate the wise, cautious, sound position of the President, who is guarding the interests of this Nation as a whole and does not see fit to give everything to a coastwise shipping interest that may use the Panama Canal. We must not forget that, with the exception of a few States bordering on the Atlantic seaboard and those bordering on the Pacific Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico, the greater part of the commerce of this country originates in the interior. The coal, lumber, wheat, and corn of the West and the Middle West must fight a battle with the railroads before they can get to a ship. The freight on a ton of coal from West Virginia must pay $1.40 to the Atlantic seaboard before it can get in sight of any kind of a vessel. It must pay from 80 cents to $1.05 before it can reach the Great Lakes.

When it gets to the Great Lakes it is interested in all of those questions involved in the treaties which affect the operation of the canals which I have mentioned, and the coal and timber interest of West Virginia is interested in every one of those transportation problems on the Great Lakes much more than the small traffic which may be involved in the coastwise trade that will go through the Panama Canal. If we rush headlong to the conclusion that the words "all nations" in this treaty do not include us, we may not complain when other nations will construe the same words so as to exclude their own domestic or coastwise traffic. We did have a controversy with England about the Welland Canal. It has been mentioned in these debates. There was involved in that controversy the meaning of the words "on terms of equality." Canada violated that treaty by providing a rebate of 18 cents a ton on grain carried to Montreal or points east thereof. Inasmuch as the United States did not carry any grain to Montreal or points east, and Canada carried practically all of her grain to Montreal or points east, the effect of the order was that Canada got all of her freight, or practically all of it, through the canal at practically 18 cents a ton less than was charged the United States. This, we claimed, was making the conditions or charges of traffic unjust to the United States. There was a great deal of diplomatic correspondence upon the subject, and finally the United States passed a retaliatory act, and finally England receded from her position. It is claimed by free-toll advocates that England still maintains that she did not violate the treaty. Even so, but she does not enforce her claim. So with us now, the thing to do is not to enforce any claim which we might have at this time. The great stake which we have in the canals to the north of us, in the business of the world, in the friendly cooperation with foreign powers, in our own dignity and honor, should constrain us to do now as England did then; that is, no matter what our rights may be we need not enforce those rights now, but leave that matter until such a time as we can check up where our interests are, how our position when taken may affect us to the east, south, north, and west, and when that time shall come, when we have all of the information and we are fully informed as to what our rights are, we can then take our position, if we desire to do so. While we may not concede anything now, and we are not, let us not by our demands make a precedent which may lose more than we can possibly gain. From the standpoint of self-interest we should pause and see where we are.

My colleague has paid a beautiful and a touching tribute to the flag of our country. He fought to maintain what he considered its dignity and honor at a time when I was too young to appreciate the issues which were involved. That tribute was worthy of him and of the State which he and I represent on this floor. It was a true burst of sentiment that mingled personal recollections and sufferings with the lofty promptings of his heart; and he is excusable, even to be commended, for forgetting for the moment that the law and its interpretation and justice and her votaries do not appeal to flags or arms.

His long experience at the bar and on the bench, his discriminating judicial mind, and his keen intellect, schooled and skilled to pick the wheat from the chaff in legal discussions, constrained him, no doubt, to prefer to discuss the patriotic viewpoint rather than the cold legal question that is involved on the face of the treaty of 1901.

It is hard for him to be illogical. It is easy for him to magnify and glorify the flag that speaks to him out of the years when his heart was young, his blood ran high, and his youthful patriotism led him to deeds of valor.

My love for my country's flag is as pure as his. Every drop of blood ever shed for its protection and glory I revere as my inheritance. I want it to bedeck the seas of commerce. I want it always to represent liberty and a Government founded upon a people's love and respect. I would have it respected in every land on earth as representing a people who are strong without boasting of it, who are great without self-glorification, wise without pedantry, resourceful without displaying their riches, and honest and truthful by what they do rather than by what they say.

Diplomacy and foreign policies can not shape the destinies of people except for the moment. Every enlightened, strong people like ours is a force on the face of the earth, and that force will make and unmake nations or spend its vitality in domestic or foreign quarrels. These United States do not doubt for a moment what their rightful destiny shall be. She is standing here between the two great oceans, perfecting a system of government that will avoid the mistakes of the ancient peoples of Asia, Africa, and Europe. Here is a people that take stock of themselves at regular intervals and have never made the foolish mistake of believing that anything made by man is too sacred to be changed, modified, or abolished when experience has taught that it was a mistake or that it had ceased to be useful. This is about the only real fundamental principle in the government of an enlightened, thinking, watchful people. Everything on the earth in the way of government and civilization has been changing. Changes will always go on. This people is learning that one lesson, and their good sense, their education, their energy, their enterprise, and their hatred of anarchy and disorder will take care of every emergency as it arises. There will never be any French Revolution here. Anarchy can not survive among a people who say their prayers, maintain the Christian religion, work for and earn their own living, conserve the great resources of this land, and, in an honest way, seek to make their Government truly representative of the will of a majority. A Government founded upon the consent of the governed is our fixed institution.

But this people can not, if they would, confine their influence within their own boundaries. Our star is shining for the oppressed and the unhappy everywhere. Our sword is only for defense, but our star is for conquest. Our purpose is to conquer no territory, annex no land, without the consent of its people; but our star of destiny shines by night when our people sleep. Wherever the love of liberty has enough life to sparkle; wherever men have ambition to be free and to desire to find a flag which stands for the solution of the problem of keeping opportunity's door wide open; wherever the children of men are born to misery, oppression, and suffering for that which others have done or failed to do the American flag will conquer, not armies and navies, but the hearts of men and women. Our destiny is to defend this Government of the people wherever and whenever its institutions are attacked, and to be ever prepared to do so; and to be for warlike conquest only where that is the surest defense for our threatened institutions. But our conquests of the hearts of men and women have no bounds. The "consent of the governed" is our only limitation.

I can see the day when the American flag will sail every commercial sea; when every foot of land down to the Panama Canal will be governed under a written constitution like ours, and by peaceful elections at stated intervals all political differences will be settled and the great mineral and agricultural resources of these countries will be poured into the coffers of commerce and every kind of human slave will then be a free man working out his own destiny and earning his own living. Whether fate shall take the United States Army and Navy there is very doubtful, but fate will take our influence, our institutions, and the things for which our flag stands wherever there is an unsatisfied yearning for opportunity under free institutions.

With such destiny why can we not see that frankness, honor, truth, and righteousness should be the last things which we would endanger?

As we love the flag let us make it stand for honor as well as glory; let it stand for justice as well as power. If we are to sail every sea and reach every market, what greater asset could we have than the respect and confidence of every people?

President Wilson is not building for a day but for centuries of that kind of power that goes hand in hand with justice and honor.

The fairest and the richest portion of the Western Hemisphere is glad to bow allegiance to the Stars and Stripes. This Government began its life a century and a quarter ago as the voluntary experiment of a brave, strong, enterprising people who had fled from injustice and special privilege, and who, therefore, felt that they could not afford to trust life, liberty, or the pursuit of happiness to any governmental machinery or power not subject to their own control, at least at intervals. Their experiment has been a success.

Their success in agriculture, manufacturing, mining, transportation, and invention has been signal. No less signal has been their success in general education and in raising the standard of living. We have put opportunity at the doorstep of the cabin, so that every child born in this land may have hopes of achieving the highest honors and the richest rewards. Our literature, our inventions, the story of our achievements, go to all lands of the earth; and it is no wonder that the simple story of the great Government of the western continent has challenged the admiration of the world. No one can reckon our influence toward the democratizing of the world; but we do know that, one by one, the arbitrary one-man Governments of the Old World have been liberalized, and each epoch has brought more and more power to the people. Absolute monarchies have become limited, limited monarchies have become republics, till now the enlightened nations of the earth have decided to put away the idea of God-given earthly power in government. It is useless to deny the great influence exercised by this people and their model governmental system in striking down privilege and enthroning the man.

We have made liberty enlighten the world; and the freemen of the earth will bless us for our handiwork, and will look to us for centuries to lead. We are most favorably situated to do so. We could lock up every inch of our shores, and could indefinitely live in luxury without any communication with the outside world. We could feed, clothe, educate, and advance our people till our population became many times what it is without sending a ship from our shores or receiving a cargo from abroad. We have nothing to fear from war. Our national debt is a mere trifle, which our new banking system could finance with a note at 90 days if it became necessary. Without borrowing a copper, and without a dollar of tax placed upon property, we could support an army of 1,000,000 men indefinitely. The resources of our mines and forests for centuries need not be cause for worry, and the manufacturing and agricultural possibilities of our people have never been put to a severe, not to say extreme, test. If liberty shall ever be driven to extremities when it must retire, like David at Hebron, to await God's own time for its acceptance by the world, she will make her last stand in the United States, where there is every resource and opportunity for hundreds of millions of population to live happily and well. But the other nations of the world know this as well as we do; and our products are too necessary to them to make our isolation possible, even if it could be conceived that it would ever be desirable.

In any view of present-day world politics this country and its Government, this people and their relation to humanity and to man's destiny, have an opportunity to remain what they are to-day, the beacon light of the world for governments based upon the consent of the governed. They can put hope, enthusiasm, and ambition into the breast of every young Washington, Jefferson, or Lincoln now struggling in foreign lands against odds that are placed upon him by ignorance, superstition, cowardice, or arbitrary power. America can lead the people of the earth to freedom of religion, freedom of the press, liberty of person, the right of property, and to open opportunity for every human being, if it will be true to its ideals and to the spirit which animated our fathers when they wrestled with the strong governments of the earth in our early days. We, as they, would spurn to bend the knee to any nation on earth. Our resources and our isolation are proofs against national fear. Indeed, the spirit of our people was proof against fear even when we were but a thin strip of colonies on the eastern shore of the Atlantic, and before we controlled the Gulf of Mexico, the Great Lakes, the Mississippi River, or the shores of the Pacific.

Senator JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, in his lectures on Jefferson, gives what "should, if it does not, constitute permanently a part of the very soul of our relations with foreign nations." Quoting from Jefferson's communication to our Madrid commissioners, he gives this as the "crisp and lofty" as well as the "Demosthenic" style which Jefferson had of expressing our relations with every other Government:

> We love and we value peace; we know its blessings from experience; we abhor the follies of war, and are not untried in its distresses and calamities. Unmeddling with the affairs of other nations, we have hoped that our distances and our disposition would have left us free in the example and indulgence of peace with all the world. We confide in our strength without boasting of it; we respect that of others without fearing it.

Let us "confide in our strength without boasting of it." We are not weak, so as to make it necessary to send messages like those of a Mexican dictator which describe a police force as a mighty army ready to strike for our "altars and our fires." We went through four years of Civil War, with more than a million men engaged, without being attacked by any foreign power, and we were never insulted, never humiliated.

Then, when we were exhausted and weak, we "confided in our strength without boasting of it" and learned anew of the wisdom, the long-headedness of Thomas Jefferson. It is the weak nation, like the weak man, that carries a chip on the shoulder. A bully that will not reason is as disgusting and disagreeable among nations as among men. But a strong nation, sure of its power but equally sure of its sense of justice, and as sensitive of its honor in keeping its own engagements as it is determined to insist upon its own rights, may walk erect among the nations of the earth without boasting and without fear of insult.

Such is the situation of the United States. Such do the friends of liberty, the world over, hope that she may remain. Such she must be, in order to lead the hosts of human liberty to the gradual attainment of that perfection in a government of the people which is the hope of freemen in every land.

But we can not maintain our enviable position if we fail to pay that "decent respect to the opinions of mankind" which we avowed in the opening utterance of our independence. We can not lead liberty's army unless we are as honest as we are brave, as open and frank as we are powerful and resourceful. We must have the confidence of the world. We should be ashamed to accept less than the unqualified approval of the intelligence of the world in all our foreign relations.

However hard the terms of any treaty may be, however difficult it may seem to keep our engagements with a foreign power, it should be the pride and the boast of this country that its plighted faith to another Government is as sacred as its bond or promise at home. The credit of the United States should never be allowed to be below par, and a debt of honor, which a treaty engagement is, should be regarded with that high sense of pride that obtains among men of honor when a promise can not be enforced at law. Now is the accepted time to show to the world that Americans "fear nothing but God and the doing of wrong."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in the course of the remarks of the distinguished Member who has just addressed the Senate, the idea was advanced, or at least the thought was implied, that the advantages accruing from the construction of the Panama Canal are confined exclusively to narrow strips facing both oceans, and particularly that the great valleys of the Mississippi and the Ohio have no direct concern in the legislation which is now pending before this body.

The tolls were fixed as the result of very elaborate investigations conducted and a very able report made by Prof. Emory R. Johnson, of the University of Pennsylvania. Away back in 1898 he contributed an article to the North American Review, in which he set forth the advantages to the various sections of the country of the construction of such a waterway. I am going to take the time now to read briefly from that article what he said concerning its importance to the Mississippi Valley:

> The business men of Chicago show by the agitation which they have carried on for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal that they appreciate the relation which the waterway will bear to the economic development of the Central West. The region drained by the Great Lakes and the Mississippi River and its tributaries north of a line drawn east and west through the mouth of the Ohio River includes our richest agricultural resources, our most productive iron mines, and our chief stores of bituminous coal. Its forests are of great extent and value. Besides these highly developed extractive industries, the Central West carries on a large amount of manufacture. Iron and steel, machinery, ships, furniture and other woodenwares, flour, and other commodities are manufactured in large quantities. In no other section of the country is the traffic so heavy. Chicago has more commerce than New York and more manufactures than Philadelphia. The growth of Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, Milwaukee, Duluth, St. Paul, Minneapolis, and the other prominent cities of this region exemplify its industrial resources and energy. This great central portion of the United States owes its phenomenal development mainly to the transportation facilities which have been provided by the great railroad trunk lines and the waterways afforded by the rivers, the Great Lakes, and the Erie Canal. There is no other section of the earth where cheap and efficient transportation has accomplished equal economic results, and there is certainly no section of the United States that will respond more quickly and generally to the transportation influences which the Nicaragua Canal will exert. The traffic between the Mississippi States and the trans-Cordilleran section of our country and with the foreign countries bordering the Pacific Ocean will be large. The Nicaragua Canal will do for the western trade of the upper Mississippi States what the construction of the Erie Canal and the improvement of the Great Lakes did for their traffic to and from the Atlantic.

I should not take the time of the Senate to call attention to these remarks were it not for the fact that it is now urged that that particular section of the country—that is, the Mississippi Valley—ought to be particularly antagonistic to the exemption of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, because it is asserted that the railroads transporting traffic from coast to coast will be robbed of a large portion of the revenues which they derive from that traffic, and it will be incumbent upon them, for the purpose of reimbursing themselves, to impose heavier charges upon shipments within that region. The least reflection will disclose that exactly the same argument could be made against the construction of the canal at all, and it is an argument against the construction of the canal at all. I call attention to it now because I do not believe the railroads are going to suffer at all by reason of the exemption of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, any more than they will suffer by reason of the construction of the canal in the first instance. I am satisfied that the construction of the canal is going to give such an impetus to business upon both coasts that it will be an advantage rather than a loss to the railroad companies under any circumstances.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I do not doubt that is the opinion of the distinguished professor from whom the Senator has read; but if the Senator will follow the references which I make in my speech, he will find that on the northern coast of this country we are affected by at least 29 or 30 treaties that we have with other countries, and that through the Soo Canal alone we pass many times more than the entire freight that will go through the Panama Canal. So far as my people, who are in the Mississippi Valley, are concerned, they are chiefly interested in seeing that we maintain our treaty relations and maintain the present construction of those treaties as to what equity and justice require between England and America, and that there shall be no discrimination. We are more interested in seeing that the United States shall not now put a construction upon its treaties which will injure us as to eighty or one hundred million tons of traffic than we are in considering the few million tons that will go through the Panama Canal.

I am afraid of no discussion with Prof. Johnson or with anyone else when we have the cold facts and see where we stand. We can not get away from the proposition that we can not construe our treaty with Great Britain one way this year and expect her not to construe it the same way against us the next year. We are talking about the little thing, and the Mississippi Valley is interested in the big thing, which is the traffic through the Great Lakes. Any investigation of that sort will show that I have not made any mistake in my position, even from the selfish standpoint.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the tolls bill may be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from Oklahoma may call up the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask that the Agricultural appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. GORE. I ask the Secretary to read the next amendment following the migratory-bird amendment, which was disposed of when the bill was last under consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Before that is done I desire to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Oliver	Shively
Bankhead	Gore	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Gronna	Page	Smith, S. C.
Brady	Hitchcock	Perkins	Smoot

Crawford	Lodge	Shafroth	Walsh
Cummins	McCumber	Sheppard	West
Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Sherman	Williams
du Pont	Norris	Shields

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent from the Senate on important official business.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is absent upon official business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the Secretary may read the amendment on page 40.

Mr. SMOOT. There are a good many amendments before page 40 which have been passed over.

Mr. GORE. There is only one, I think; that is, there are a number of related amendments, and I wish to have them passed over for the present. If we begin on page 40, I think we will expedite the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment on page 40 which was passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, after line 12, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry proposes to insert the following:

That hereafter all moneys received as contributions toward cooperative work in forest investigations, or the protection and improvement of the national forests, shall be covered into the Treasury and shall constitute a special fund, which is hereby appropriated and made available until expended, as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, for the payment of the expenses of said investigations, protection, or improvements by the Forest Service, and for refunds to the contributors of amounts heretofore or hereafter paid in by them in excess of their share of the cost of said investigations, protection, or improvements.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma if it is his purpose to offer as an amendment to this amendment the suggestion which I made to him several days ago?

Mr. GORE. I have the amendment in my hand. I send it to the desk and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the committee amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That annual reports shall be made to Congress of all such moneys so received as contributions for such cooperation work.

Mr. GORE. I ask for the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Before the amendment is adopted I wish the Senator from Oklahoma would explain briefly what the purpose of it is and what is desired to be accomplished by it.

Mr. GORE. The committee amendment preceding, that to which the amendment to the amendment is attached as a proviso, provides that all contributions made for the purpose of the improvement or protection of forests shall be covered into the United States Treasury as a special fund. There is no power under existing law to cover these moneys into the Treasury, and they are kept in banks. A recent bank failure involved a considerable loss to the Government in connection with this fund. For the sake of convenience in bookkeeping and the greater security of the moneys the amendment has been proposed. It was then suggested by the Senator from Wyoming that a proviso should be added requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to submit an annual report showing the amount of such moneys received by way of contributions and the objects upon which they had been expended. That is the purpose of the proviso.

Mr. BORAH. I do not care to make any further suggestion in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 41, line 9, where it is proposed by the committee to strike out the word "chief" before the words "food and drug inspector," and after the word "inspector" to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500," so as to read:

One food and drug inspector, $2,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment of the committee passed over is, on page 46——

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I notice that I have marked here in the bill an amendment that I want to offer to a committee amendment on page 42, line 23. It says "Western States." I wish to extend the appropriation so that it shall read "Western and Southern States." We have been trying for years to utilize the by-products—the waste that comes from the sawmills—in the Southern States. I do not know why the appropriation was confined entirely to Western States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator know why it should not be general—why it should not apply to all the States?

Mr. WEST. I think it ought to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. We do some lumbering in little New England.

Mr. WEST. I am willing to make it apply to all the States. I know we do quite as much lumbering in the South as is done in the West, and we are trying to make use of the by-products. A fourth, at least, of a tree goes to waste ordinarily in the South in getting lumber out of the tree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the amendment offered by the committee on page 42 has already been adopted as in Committee of the Whole. The proper course for the Senator from Georgia to pursue, if he desires to further amend it, would be to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to or to wait until the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. WEST. I understand that I can take it up in the Senate. I suggested it, but it was not noticed at the time. I had it marked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that it was not acted upon then, but the Senator can move to amend the amendment at the proper time, when the bill is reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEST. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. In this connection I will now give notice that when the amendment reaches the Senate I will move, if no other Senator does, to strike out the word "Western" and to insert the word "United," so as to read "United States."

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent to accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I will ask unanimous consent that the vote be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment on page 42 was adopted be reconsidered.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a Senator who is very much interested in this amendment is not in his seat just now, and I ask that it may go over until he can be present. The junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], who is a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, is very much interested in the amendment.

Mr. WEST. I did not hear the remark of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I made the statement that the Senator who offered this amendment, the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], is not in his seat at present, and I asked that it might go over until such time as he may be here.

Mr. WEST. All right. I will offer to amend the amendment after the bill gets into the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the proper course.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not want to make the objection so that we can not return to the amendment. I simply ask that it go over until the Senator from Idaho is present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, and it will be open to amendment in the Senate in any event. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 46, line 13, after the numerals "$36,500," the committee report to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That of the amount hereby appropriated, the sum of not exceeding $5,000 may be used for the erection of a small laboratory building on the experimental farm of the Department of Agriculture at Arlington, Va., for the purpose of studying fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by electrical methods, plans and specifications for the building to be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture and all work done under his supervision.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if that amount—namely, $5.000—was suggested by the department for this particular purpose?

Mr. GORE. The estimate was submitted, I think, in the regular estimates, but I am not certain about that. However, the matter was submitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and since the amendment was passed over the other day at the instance of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]—or rather, I believe, at the instance of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]—I have taken it up with the Secretary of Agriculture. It is estimated that $5.000 will be sufficient to construct the necessary building. The purpose is to conduct experiments with reference to the extraction of nitrogen from the air. It is the intention of the department to construct a building about 40 by 60 feet with a peaked roof about 30 feet from the ground. It is necessary to utilize a heavy electrical current and heavy apparatus in conducting these experiments.

The Senator from Washington indicated when he had the amendment passed over that he desired to be informed whether this amount would be sufficient or whether it would be followed up by a larger appropriation hereafter. I think there is no probability of such a request being made. It is a most important undertaking, and I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by electric methods is known all over the world. Nitrogen is being produced by the million tons, particularly in Norway and in Canada. It does seem to me that a mere appropriation of $5,000 to construct a building here is going to be an absolute waste of money. I can not conceive what $5,000 will do in experimenting along this line.

Mr. GALLINGER. And, if the Senator will permit me, I want to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if my memory is at fault when I recall the fact that there is a private enterprise in one of the Southern States engaged in this very process.

Mr. SMOOT. In North Carolina.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think in North Carolina or Tennessee. I am sure I read something about it.

Mr. GORE. I am not advised upon that subject. I think the purpose is to cheapen the process. My understanding is that the present processes are more expensive than are justified.

Mr. SMOOT. And I say to the Senator that the expenditure of $5,000 will never demonstrate the question of cheapening the process. Laboratory experiments for cheapening the process of the production of nitrogen from the air based upon an expenditure of $5,000, it seems to me, are absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. GORE. I think the experts in the department have looked fully into the matter, and their information seems to differ from that of the Senator from Utah. The process of extracting nitrogen is well known, but it is desired to experiment with a view to cheapening the process and accomplishing the result on a large scale. It is thought that $5,000 will enable the department to construct a large and commodious but not an expensive building and provide the necessary apparatus to conduct these experiments in a way that will justify the general use of nitrogen obtained from the air.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator really think that private enterprise that has been studying this question for years and years would allow a mere amount of $5,000 to interfere with the processes that may produce a larger production from the air in nitrogen by new experiments? This question has been before the world for a great many years. I know the men who started it. I do not know the amount, but I know they spent hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars in the laboratories of Germany. I know when the proposition was brought to this country for the formation of the first company. I know, Mr. President, that those men, studying in laboratories in Germany to-day, have the very highest intelligence that there is in the world. They are looking out for processes for cheapening the production of nitrogen from the air. It does seem to me that a $5,000 appropriation for somebody to be located in a little wooden building down here in Virginia is almost ridiculous.

I want to say to the Senator now, if this appropriation is made and if we ever have any good whatever come from it, it will only be the beginning of an appropriation; that there is no telling what it will be in the future.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the object of this appropriation is of vital concern to the farmers of the country. I know of no object upon which $5,000, or even five times $5,000 or fifty times $5,000, could be expended that would be more important. If the Government can add anything to the celebrities who are investigating the subject, with whom the Senator from Utah enjoys personal acquaintance, it certainly ought to be gratifying to the Senator, as it would undoubtedly be gratifying to the farmers of this country.

I have listened during the last few days to the Senator's homily on economy, and I think the modesty of the appropriation was perhaps inspired, in some measure, by the lectures which he had recently been reading to the Senate on the subject of economy.

I now send to the desk a letter from the department on this subject. I confess, Mr. President, no expert scientific knowledge on the subject myself, and with all consideration for the Senator I would feel inclined rather to accept the opinion of the experts of the department than his unscientific—if I may say with due deference—opinion on this subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator to place me in a position that I do not occupy. There is no Senator in this body who would more willingly than myself appropriate money that would assist the farmers in any way. But I do know if we are going to make an appropriation for this object, we ought to make an appropriation large enough so that some good would come from it, and not appropriate merely $5,000 simply as a starter, and then when we get started have demands made upon us for a larger appropriation. I would rather the amount would be $50,000 right now than $5,000 if we are going to undertake this class of work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the letter at the request of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The SECRETARY. After citing the amendment proposed and as the paragraph would appear when amended, the communication reads:

> The purpose of this amendment is to enable the department to erect a small laboratory building for the study of fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by electrical methods. The experimental work in this direction requires the use of heavy electrical currents, and consequently heavy apparatus, such as furnaces, transformers, generators, switchboards, etc. It is impracticable to mount such heavy apparatus in the laboratory building now occupied by the Bureau of Soils, even if the necessary space were available. Flue stacks would have to be provided, floors for pouring hot slag, etc. A small complete building, separate from other buildings, and of fireproof construction is essential to a safe handling of this work. It is proposed to erect a plain brick and corrugated iron building, about 40 feet wide, 60 feet long, with a peaked roof, 30 feet from floor to ridgepole. It is estimated that the necessary building can be erected for $5,000. The necessary land upon which to erect the building is available on the department's farm at Arlington, Va.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while I have no definite knowledge on this particular subject, I think, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] said, it is one of great importance, if nitrogen can be successfully gotten out of the air.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been gotten out of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; in some instances, I understand. It is something worthy of our most careful consideration. I understand from the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], who is sitting in front of me, and who knows more about it than I do, that in Norway they are now successfully extracting nitrogen from the air and shipping it all over the world.

It seems to me that we can well afford to spend some money for the purpose of experimentation in this particular branch of agriculture, and if it should develop that we can improve upon present conditions known to the scientific men of the world and cheapen the product we would have certainly accomplished one of the greatest things that could possibly be accomplished by our Agricultural Department.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska that they have what they call saltpeter works, where nitrogen is extracted from the air, at what they call Rjakanfoss Falls, in the country of Norway. They have machinery which amounts to 600,000 horsepower. They are manufacturing hundreds of barrels of this saltpeter every day, and they are shipping it all over the world. As the Senator has said, it is certainly worth trying, but whether this is a sufficient amount, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has said, that is another question.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I wanted to ask the Senator from Oklahoma, with the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, if they have water power where they contemplate locating this building.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I was going to ask.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to take up that subject. That is my principal object. I will be glad to yield to the Senator before I do that, if he has anything further to say.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was about to bring up the very question suggested by the Senator. I want to say now that there is being erected in Canada, where they have immense water power, one of these nitrogen plants. I think they have erected one lately in South Carolina, where they have a great water power. What I was going to ask the Senator was where they would get the water power at Arlington.

Mr. NORRIS. I am coming to that. That was my principal object in taking the floor at this time. Of course, the appropriation of $5,000 is only for the purpose of erecting a building here for experimental purposes. If we never went any further than that there would be enough to experiment there, as far as the power required for this experiment. The question the Senator from North Carolina asks, of course, I can not answer. I presume they would construct a building there for experiments with nitrogen and perhaps get some of the corporations to furnish the power.

Mr. OVERMAN. It requires an immense voltage.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that it does require a good deal of power; but what I was going to say was that if this should be successful, if the experiments should develop possibilities perhaps of cheapening the best-known methods now for this work, it seems to me, located, as I understand this plant is going to be, just across the line in Virginia, at Arlington, between here and the Great Falls of the Potomac River, I have no doubt that in the course of a few years there will be developed one of the greatest water powers in the United States. The place selected is very appropriate, it seems to me, because if this power that has for centuries been going to waste in the Potomac River is developed to its full capacity there will be an immense amount of electricity that will be developed from water power that could not be fully utilized in the District of Columbia, even though all the utilities now using electricity were supplied. seems to me it is an appropriate place, because later on Senate and the other House will have before them for consideration a proposition to develop the water power between Washington and Great Falls on the Potomac River, and Arlington is right on the shore of the river where we will develop the power. If it is developed, it will probably be developed by the Government of the United States; and, as I have said, if it is developed to its full capacity—the object being, of course, to supply electricity to the District—there will be a large amount of electrical energy that can not be utilized, because it will develop more power than the entire city or the entire District could utilize. It seems, therefore, that it is appropriate that we should have the scientific men of the Agricultural Department investigate this matter with a view of cheapening this product, because of its necessity to the farmers of the country; and the place selected for the experiment is very appropriate, for it may eventually become a large establishment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought the Senator from Nebraska had concluded.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator wishes to address the Senate, I had just as lief yield the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire only to make an observation, as is my custom ordinarily. I notice that the tendency of our appropriation bills lately has been to divert a portion of the appropriations to some specific purpose. I presume ordinarily they are wise purposes. I do not know whether or not this is wise, but it occurs to me that it may well be questioned. The letter from the department which was read says that a building can be erected for $5,000. The appropriation is $5,000. I apprehend that there will have to be some costly machinery in this building before any work can be carried on, and, of course, some additional appropriation will have to be made for that purpose and probably a very large appropriation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from New Hampshire will note that the entire appropriation is $36,500.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. This particular amendment specifies that only $5,000 of that sum shall be used for a building; and I presume the balance of the appropriation would be available for machinery, if it be necessary, or for any other paraphernalia that would be necessary to carry out the object of the appropriation.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad to have the Senator from Nebraska call my attention to that fact. I think probably the Senator is right, but whether or not $31,500 additional would come anywhere near doing what would be required in an institution of this kind is, to my mind, very questionable.

As to the location, possibly this is the best one that can be found; but the development of the Great Falls water power has been discussed ever since I have been in public life, and I think it was discussed a great many years prior to my appearance on this scene. It is probable that that water power will at some time be utilized either by the Government or by private parties; but that is in the dim and distant future, as I view it. So I think we will hardly be justified to make an appropriation to establish a building of this kind at Arlington with the view that the power will come from the Great Falls of the Potomac in the near future; but, Mr. President, I am so thoroughly imbued with the idea that this is an appropriation of money in the right direction, that I certainly shall not offer any factious opposition to the item that is being discussed; but I think I agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] on that point, that if we are going into this matter we ought to go into it with a sufficient appropriation to enable us to make a fair test of this question, so as to demonstrate whether or not our people, with their genius and their enterprise, can accomplish more in this direction than Sweden has done or than Germany has done up to the present time. If we can do that, no appropriation that we could reasonably think of would be too much for the purpose.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say about the matter. I am simply fearful that this small appropriation will not accomplish any good result, and yet it is possible that it may be sufficient, all things considered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am very much interested in this subject. I should like to see nitrogen manufactured in the United States in great quantities. The only way that that can be done is to have an immense water power. I am informed that it would be almost useless to undertake to manufacture nitrogen from the air on a commercial basis without having a water power generating at least 200,000 horsepower. In Norway the smallest one they have generates 400,000 horsepower. I want to say that, if we could manufacture nitrogen in this country, I agree with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] that it would be a splendid thing, because there is not a farmer in the United States who would not be benefited by cheap fertilizers.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from Utah will allow me, I wish to say to him that it is just as important and as absolutely necessary to have water as to have power in the manufacture or conversion of nitrogen into fertilizer.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking, of course, of water power, because it never in the world would do to create the power by steam, for the reason that it would be too expensive.

Mr. GRONNA. But the reason I make that statement is that it has been stated here that this plant should be located at Arlington.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course no one could expect to make a success by locating a plant of that kind at Arlington to manufacture saltpeter, for it could not be done. You must have the water as well as the power.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and in commercial quantities.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to add, further, if the Senator from Utah will permit me, that the cost of the plant at Rjukan Foss, Norway, was 40,000,000 crowns, which amounts to in our money nearly $11,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. From the letter which was read here from the Secretary of Agriculture I take it, now that all of the $5,000 is going into the building, that the building alone will cost that much. I must say that the wording of the amendment is rather strange, and it misled me somewhat, as the amendment reads:

That of the amount hereby appropriated—

That is, $36,500—

the sum of not exceeding $5,000 may be used for the erection of a small laboratory building on the experimental farm of the Department of Agriculture at Arlington, Va., for the purpose of studying fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by electrical methods, plans and specifications for the building to be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture and all work done under his supervision.

I would very much prefer to see the appropriation of $36,500 increased, if we are going into that class of experimental work.

I want to ask the Senator from Oklahoma is there a provision anywhere else in this bill or in any other appropriation bill for the purpose of providing the necessary apparatus with which to make these experiments?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I take it that out of the remaining $31,500 the department would probably be able to procure and to install the necessary apparatus. They have been studying the question on a small scale in the laboratory of the Bureau of Soils.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if we undertake to do that——

Mr. GORE. Of course I may say the sum would be inadequate to install heavier machinery for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Whenever you undertake to do that, of course the $31,500 which would be left would amount to almost nothing for the balance of the purposes provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. GORE. Let me say now to the Senator that he seems to misconceive the idea that I have, or else I misconceive the purpose of the amendment. There is not any view of manufacturing nitrogen for commerce in this establishment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah has never thought that for a moment.

Mr. GORE. The Senator suggested the employment of 200,000 horsepower. I do not suppose there are many places on earth where that much power can be generated.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Oklahoma is not well informed, then.

Mr. GORE. I confess——

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say that I have never had in mind the idea of manufacturing nitrogen from air at Arlington. The Senator from Oklahoma must know, if he knows anything, that a plant that would manufacture nitrogen in commercial quantities would cost millions of dollars and not $5,000.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I appreciate the fact that it would require the outlay of a great deal of money to install such a plant. Was the Senator from Utah through? Am I interrupting the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma desires to know whether the Senator from Utah has yielded the floor?

Mr. GORE. I understood I was interrupting the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the least. I understand from what I thought I heard the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] say he wants me to take my seat.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do, Mr. President, and I make the point that the Senator has already been on the floor four times on this subject, and the rule allows him——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. I have the floor now. I suggested to the Senator from Oklahoma that, instead of interrupting the Senator from Utah, he let him finish his speech and get through, and then for the Senator from Oklahoma to take the floor himself, in the interest of the economy of time. I made that suggestion, and I am perfectly willing for the Senator from Utah to know I made it.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I had the floor. The Presiding Officer of the Senate recognized me; I asked a question of the Senator from Oklahoma, who was answering the question, and I never took my seat. The Senator from Georgia had no right to speak when he did. He did not ask for recognition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator from Utah has already spoken three times on this particular subject, and is not entitled to speak upon it again.

Mr. SMOOT. It is now after 1 o'clock; we are not now transacting morning business, nor are we in the morning hour.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the general rule of the Senate. I ask the attention of the Chair to Rule XIX, paragraph 1, as follows:

> No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Presiding Officer; and no Senator shall speak more than twice upon any one question in debate on the same day without leave of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to decide how many times the Senator from Utah has spoken. He has had the floor continuously, and has been interrupted.

Mr. SMOOT. I was recognized when I first began to speak, and in consequence of that recognition I claim the floor now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as that is concerned, I want to say to the Senator from Oklahoma, with the permission of the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I give the Senator my permission.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not asking these questions to delay this bill; I am not asking these questions for any purpose other than to find out what this appropriation is for. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge has not yet stated what it is intended to do with this appropriation. I do not know whether or not he knows what is intended to be accomplished by it, but I do know that if the appropriation is made—and I am in full sympathy with what I understand to be the object of it—then its object ought to be clearly understood by the Senate. It also seems to me that the appropriation that is made is not sufficient to result in a successful investigation of this matter. That is all I care about, and I thought it worth while calling the attention of the Senate to the matter. If the Senate wants to undertake the proposed work with this appropriation, well and good; but I think the Senate of the United States ought to know that with this appropriation it will be impossible to secure the information that is desired by the department. So that, Mr. President, as I have already said, I should like to see this appropriation either increased or not agreed to at all.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, the amount of $5,000 set aside under the proviso is for the erection of a small laboratory building on the experimental farm of the Department of Agriculture at Arlington. It is simply a part of the appropriation of $36,500, and I think it is a very wise appropriation for us to make, for the reason that the electrical apparatus is already in place at Arlington. We do not have to erect a great power plant; we simply buy the current from a company; and any company that is selling current furnishes the transformers and delivers the current at a stated price.

In reference to the voltage necessary for the manufacture of this article, that is a very simple matter also. There are many places on farms in my State and on farms in the State of the Senator from Utah where they reduce the voltage from fifty, sixty, and seventy thousand volts down to 110 volts, to be used for heating, lighting, and cooking in the home. It is done by merely placing a simple series of transformers. I can take a single No. 6 wire, smaller than the smallest finger on the hand, and transmit the current over that wire, or a set of such wires, and by putting in a series of transformers, at no great expense, can throw the voltage up to 200,000 volts at the Government station at Arlington.

It seems to me it must be very plain to anyone who has studied this matter that the Government is not going to manufacture this article for commercial purposes. We simply desire to experiment in something which we hope will be beneficial to the farmer; and in experimenting it is not necessary to have a large plant; a small plant will answer all purposes, so as to demonstrate what can be done. There are many places in the United States where there is plenty of power lying idle. To-day on the Snake River in Idaho, within 20 miles of my home, in a distance of 75 miles there is 500,000 undeveloped and unused horsepower running to waste.

It seems to me that it is worth trying to see what we can do. It is not as if we were going to put up a new station. The Secretary of Agriculture appeared before the committee and explained that this appropriation was simply designed to provide a separate and distinct place for this particular work which is to be done for the benefit of the farmers. The Government owns the station there now; other improvements are there; and all that is needed for this special work is the small sum of $5,000 for the erection of the proposed building. Taking everything into consideration, it seems to me that it is only fair that we should accept the statement of the Secretary, who appeared before us, and stated that this sum would be sufficient to demonstrate the matter so far as was necessary at this time. For that reason I think that we should make this appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the House, after conferring with the Department of Agriculture, appropriated $36,500 "for exploration and investigation within the United States to determine possible sources of supply of potash, nitrates, and other natural fertilizers."

When the officials of the department came before us they concluded that they wanted to use part of that appropriation to erect a larger and more suitable laboratory for their experimentation. They have already most of the necessary machinery. It is not for a moment thought that we are going into the industrial pursuit of manufacturing nitrogen out of the air. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has stated the case so clearly that it seems to me every Senator ought to be satisfied. The department simply stated, as to part of this money, that it will be an economy to let us construct a better and a bigger place on the Arlington experimental farm in which to do our work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to say just one word. I do not profess to know as much about this subject or about any other subject as does the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], but I do know that it would require a good deal of capital to establish a plant for the manufacture of nitrogen on a commercial basis. I do know that this is a matter of considerable importance to the agricultural interests of this country. I do not know anything about the technique or the science of this subject. I could not install a plant myself and I could not extract by any process any nitrogen from the air. I am therefore obliged to defer to the department and to the scientists of the department upon matters of this sort. They have estimated for $5,000, and, in their judgment, that amount will be sufficient. In the judgment of the Senator from Utah it will not be sufficient. I simply submit that issue to the Senate, adding that I also know that there are not many places in the world where electrical energy can be developed from water power to the amount of 200,000 horsepower.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say just a word in relation to this amendment. The objection which I understand the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] makes is not to the gross appropriation of $36,500, but it is to the proviso. That proviso is that of the $36,500, $5,000 may be expended, at the discretion, evidently, of the officers of the department, in the construction of a laboratory. Of course, we are not experts in the matter of the making of nitrogen; but the department evidently had in mind certain experiments which it desired to make, and it thinks that $5,000 will be sufficient for that purpose.

It seems to me that to appropriate a larger amount than that in the proviso would be to cripple the balance of the $36,500 appropriation. In view of the fact that the department will have the expenditure of all of this money, and inasmuch as it estimates that $5,000 is sufficient to make the experiments which it is desired to make, it seems to me that it is wise to keep in the bill the proviso which is embodied in the amendment offered by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 48, line 20, before the word "Argentine," it is proposed to insert "cigarette beetle and"; and in line 21, after the word "ant," to strike out "$59,000" and insert "$84,000, of which sum $25,000 shall be immediately available," so as to make the paragraph read:

For investigations of insects affecting southern field crops, including insects affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar cane, etc., and the cigarette beetle and Argentine ant, $84,000, of which sum $25,000 shall be immediately available.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Even, Mr. President, at the risk of receiving an unpleasant suggestion from the Senator from Oklahoma, I want to call attention to the fact that this is another instance of a Democratic subsidy. They are so numerous in this bill that I am not sure that I will call attention to all of them now; but this is manifestly one of them. It is an appropriation of a large sum of money to investigate insects affecting southern field crops, a purely local matter, and doubtless a very desirable thing to do; but when a Senator a few days ago declared that "subsidy" grated harshly on the ears of Democrats, I can not help calling attention to the fact that the ears of Democrats must be very much disturbed as we consider this bill.

Mr. President, beyond that I want a little information—and doubtless the Senator from Oklahoma can give it to me—as to what kind of an insect a "cigarette beetle" is. If it is an insect that eats cigarettes, I want to make a large appropriation for that insect; but if it is an insect that is shaped like a cigarette, or something of that kind, that would give me very desirable information. Will the Senator tell me something about this beetle?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] has a splendid assortment of cigarette beetles in his office and will be delighted to regale the Senator, not only with cigarette beetles, but I doubt not with cigarettes themselves; and, enjoying the smoke, I feel sure that his enthusiasm over subsidy and the fact that to some extent he has converted Democrats to his doctrine and his dogma, will bring about a state of splendid exaltation on his part. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have noticed with great gratification that we are getting some converts on that side to favor subsidies, and I have listened with a great deal of interest to two distinguished Democrats who have treated of this subject recently; but I have no disposition to discuss the question of subsidy on this bill, except, as I have done, to call attention to the fact that it would be well for us all to investigate as well the question of subsidy so as to find out what it is as to find out what is the cigarette beetle.

Now, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I will not accept any of the cigarettes which the Senator from Florida may have, who, in his generosity, no doubt would give me all I wanted, if I used them. I do not use them; but I should like to know just a little something about the cigarette beetle, and I think I am entitled to the information.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in a moment I shall yield to the Senator from Florida, who will be able to elucidate this subject, I am sure, to the satisfaction of the senior Senator from New Hampshire. I may say, in this connection, that owing to the long and splendid services of the Senator from New Hampshire, I feel disposed to follow him on almost every subject almost everywhere; and upon the subject of subsidies I will go with him to the sea, but I can not go to sea with him in respect to subsidies. [Laughter.]

I may say that we find in New England a magnificent precedent for this appropriation, as we find New England precedents for almost every patriotic service which we undertake here or elsewhere. Congress has been expending for years large sums of money to exterminate, if possible, the brown-tail moth and the gypsy moth, which have wrought such extensive ravages in the States of New England. It has been the desire of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, subsidy or not, to render what assistance we could to that section in exterminating this pest, which is destroying the vegetation of the forests of that region. I have no doubt that this patriotic purpose has the enthusiastic indorsement of the Senator from New Hampshire. The present bill carries, I believe, two hundred and fifty-odd thousand dollars for the extirpation of the brown-tail moth and the gypsy moth. They work no such havoc, so far as value is concerned, as the boll weevil and other pests which afflict the South.

This measure is in no sense a sectional measure. It undertakes to look with equal eyes upon every section, and to lend the helping hand of the Government whenever and wherever it can render real service to any State, to any section, to any community, or to any interest. I doubt not that patriotic purpose challenges the Senator's approval.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I have introduced an amendment, on behalf of my colleague, covering the cigarette beetle. It seems that the cigarette beetle has nothing to do with cigarettes. I will read to the Senator the letter which my colleague left with me from a gentleman who has made some experiments, in which he describes this insect. He says:

The cigarette beetle is, without a doubt, one of the most damaging enemies to the trade.

That is, to the tobacco trade.

It is very hard to estimate the loss in dollars and cents occasioned each year by this bug—

So it seems that it is not only not a cigarette beetle, but it is not a beetle at all—but I have seen it placed conservatively at from $3,000,000 to $10,000,000 per annum. * * *

The cigarette beetle lays its egg on the leaf, which leaf is later made into a cigar, at which time the egg hatches into a worm, which bores a hole through the cigar in its effort to get out. This hole, of course, destroys the drawing quality of the cigar and renders it valueless.

The experiments which this gentleman says have been made heretofore have been in the use of X-rays, by which he claims they are able to sterilize the egg and avoid the holes being bored in the cigars; and the department has cooperated in that work, I believe, to the extent of about $2,000. The writer of this letter thinks the method by which they undertake to treat the tobacco leaf is successful, but the department is working along other lines.

That is all I know about the cigarette beetle. I wish to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that he need not hesitate to come to my office, because I neither use nor have any cigarettes there.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to express regret that this is not a beetle that devours cigarettes. I hoped it was. If I could be assured of that, I should be inclined to move an amendment increasing this appropriation.

I understand this is a beetle or a bug that attacks the tobacco plant. That being the case, it is on all fours with our appropriations—every one of them subsidies—for the extermination of the boll weevil and the gypsy and brown-tail moth, which the Senator from Oklahoma says infests the New England States—one of the greatest pests the world has ever seen. I have always favored those appropriations, and of course I favor this appropriation. I think it is a very proper one.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not the increase over the House provision—$25,000—was made on account of the cigarette-beetle provision?

Mr. GORE. It was not made on that account.

Mr. JONES. What is the purpose of the increase?

Mr. GORE. I will refer the Senator in a moment to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], who is entirely informed upon this particular item. It has relation to the devising of ways and means to wage war against the boll weevil. As the Senator will remember from the discussion the other day about demonstration work, the boll weevil has been assailed through cultural methods. It is believed by a scientist in Louisiana that he has possibly devised a way or expedient by which he will be able to approach the weevil and prevent it by other resources.

Mr. JONES. Why does not anything like that come under the former appropriation we have made for the boll-weevil problem?

Mr. GORE. It is an entirely different character of work. The former appropriation was carried under a provision for demonstration work. That system is pursued under cultural methods. This is a general provision for the extermination of different kinds of insects, pests, and parasites, and is properly classified in this place. It is under the Bureau of Entomology.

Mr. JONES. Are there any other appropriations in this bill for which the boll weevil is responsible?

Mr. GORE. I think this ends the account of the boll weevil in the pending bill, at least for the present.

Mr. JONES. On page 20, under the paragraph making the appropriation of $628,240 for the boll weevil, the bill says:

and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil.

That is not confined to any particular method. It seems to me that under that language you can do what you expect to do under this paragraph. Why is it necessary, therefore, to appropriate additional money for the boll weevil in another paragraph when you have $628,240 for it under that paragraph?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the $628,240 is used through the cooperative demonstration work.

Mr. JONES. It may be used in that way, but it is not confined to that use by the language of the bill.

Mr. GORE. Even if that were true, the entire amount is necessary for the work which is contemplated to be done under that provision. It is possible that a proviso attached there, carrying an additional appropriation of $25,000, with a specific direction as to its use, would have answered the purpose; but there is no special reason why that should have been done.

Mr. JONES. Has the department sent in an estimate for this $25,000?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, if I may be permitted——

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. It has sent in an estimate. I have in my hand a memorandum furnished me by the department, which reads as follows——

Mr. JONES. Is that a recommendation for it, or is it an estimate sent in to Congress in the regular way?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is an estimate sent in after the original estimates were made.

Mr. JONES. Has any estimate been sent through the Secretary of the Treasury for this additional appropriation?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not answer that question; but the department certainly recommends this appropriation, and the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture was before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in reference to it. I have in my hand, as I have just stated, a memorandum showing just what this $25,000 is for. I also have a letter from the agricultural agent at Tallulah, La., showing the purposes to which he is going to apply it, and I think I can explain to the Senator's satisfaction the beneficent purposes to which this appropriation is to be applied, if he will permit me to do so.

Mr. JONES. The Senator need not go into that, so far as I am concerned. I have no doubt the purposes are beneficent purposes; but it seems to me that when we have so many provisions here for the investigation of the boll weevil we ought not to include that in almost every paragraph of the bill. It ought to be covered under one paragraph of the bill, and that ought to be enough.

Mr. RANSDELL. There are hundreds of paragraphs in this bill, and the boll weevil is referred to in only two of them, so far as I know. I think it is a little unfair for the Senator to say that we are including the weevil in almost every paragraph. We have the weevil under the farmers' cooperative demonstration work, the explanation of which has just been given very clearly by the Senator in charge of the bill. That is an entirely different character of work from the scientific investigation conducted by the Bureau of Entomology. The Bureau of Entomology is seeking to find out everything that can be ascertained in regard to all of these insects that affect cotton, tobacco, sugar cane, and so forth, in a general way. When it ascertains information on these subjects, that information is applied by the farmers' cooperative demonstration work, so far as it affects cotton and the other crops with which it is operating.

This sum of $25,000, to be made immediately available, I may say to the Senator, is for the practical work of the agent of the Bureau of Entomology in the very portion of Louisiana where I live. It is to carry on some experiments there, to try some new methods. The boll weevil there, I may say, has practically driven out of business the people of that section. It has caused the loss of a great many millions of dollars.

Mr. JONES. I do not question that.

Mr. RANSDELL. In that immediate section, in the overflowed lands of Louisiana, we suffer from the ravages of water as well as the ravages of insects, and it seems impossible to make cotton. Right in that section, where there is very heavy vegetation, where there is a great deal of moisture, where it is very warm, the Bureau of Entomology is trying to conduct a series of experiments which have been highly recommended by Mr. Smith, who has been there for several years trying to demonstrate his ideas. This gentleman so thoroughly convinced the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture that his plans are correct and that his ideas are good that the Assistant Secretary is anxious to have him demonstrate them. It will take some money to do it.

Mr. JONES. Can the Senator tell me what the appropriation for this purpose was for the current year?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not answer that question. I assume that it was $50,000. That is what the appropriation was before it was amended by this addition; but I do not know whether it was that amount or not.

Mr. JONES. Can the Senator tell me whether or not the appropriation is exhausted?

Mr. RANSDELL. I was told by Dr. Galloway that it was practically exhausted; that there is no money that can be applied to this purpose.

Mr. JONES. Of course, I am perfectly willing to appropriate all the money that is necessary if there is any hope of checking and overcoming the ravages of the boll weevil. The statement of the Senator that under this paragraph he expects to do that attracted my attention when I remembered that we had increased by $250,000 the appropriation to combat the ravages of the boll weevil, so I was a little bit surprised that one of the main purposes of this paragraph was to do that. I hope it will be successful, and I hope what the Senator expects from it will be realized.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for his kind wishes, and I hope the item will be agreed to without further discussion.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to say one word to the Senator from Washington to illustrate the principle upon which the bill has been drafted. It may not be the very best possible principle.

In one section of the bill there is an appropriation of $114,000 carried for the investigation of the best methods of exterminating insects affecting cereals. That would come under the Bureau of Entomology. Another section carries an appropriation of $135,000 for investigating diseases affecting cereals. They are two distinct appropriations, but the service is devolved upon different bureaus or divisions, and for that reason the items are carried in different places and different sections of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator why the amount of $25,000 is made immediately available?

Mr. GORE. The work contemplated under this appropriation must begin this spring, prior to the beginning of the next fiscal year. I agree with the Senator that it is a bad practice to make these appropriations immediately available; but in this particular instance it is justified by the fact that an entire year will be lost unless the money is made available at once.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that this is a deficiency measure pure and simple. We are going to have a deficiency bill here in a very short time. It seems to me it is not only a very bad practice but a wicked practice to take the regular agricultural appropriation bill and put a deficiency appropriation upon it.

In view of what the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has already said, I am not going to make a point of order against this item at this time, because I know what suffering the people of Louisiana are passing through at this time. I know the losses they are sustaining, and the frightful condition they are in, as far as their general business is concerned. If this is going to help Louisiana, I do not want to interfere with it at all; but I wish to say that I shall at least have the Senate express its opinion upon the other items here that are made immediately available.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator from Utah very much for his kindness and sympathy with the people of Louisiana, who certainly are suffering in that particular section. In order to explain to him that this is not a deficiency appropriation, let me read very briefly from the letter of Mr. George D. Smith, entomological agent at Tallulah, La., under date of May 5, to show what he is going to do with this money.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand what they are going to do with the money; but this is the proposition: If they had had enough money to go on with this work, of course they would not have been here asking for an additional appropriation. The bill as it came from the House carried $50,000. The Senate committee has added $25,000 to that.

Mr. RANSDELL. For an entirely new work, I may say; for a new idea—something that never has been tried before.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I could make the point of order on it, then, that it has not been estimated for; but I say to the Senator that I am not going to do it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not care what reason there is or what they are going to do with it; if the Senator thinks it is going to help his distracted State, I am not going to object to it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator. I believe it will help them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I simply rose for the purpose of begging my friend from Utah not to interpose an objection against this appropriation for Louisiana. It is about all the comfort they have been able to get out of the present administration, and I am glad to see them get it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask whether or not, in this matter of the boll weevil and other insects that are ravaging the crops of the southern part of the country, the States are making appropriations in conjunction with the appropriations from the General Treasury?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the States, counties, commercial clubs, and individuals, I understand, appropriate something like half a million dollars in the Southern States where this money is utilized.

Mr. GALLINGER. I notice that a proviso has been added, as follows:

That the entire expense of such service shall be defrayed from this appropriation and no contribution or endowment for said purpose shall be received or accepted from any individual, firm, company, or corporation.

Mr. GORE. The Senator has the wrong section before him. That section was disposed of some days since.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but as we are discussing the boll weevil I recur to this item concerning the boll weevil to ask these questions.

Mr. GORE. Very well. I did not mean to divert the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me rather a new idea that a community may not accept contributions from anybody to improve conditions.

Mr. GORE. The Senator perhaps was absent when a substitute for that provision was adopted by the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I was absent.

Mr. GORE. The substitute has been adopted.

Mr. GALLINGER. The point I want to suggest particularly is that the pest of the boll weevil is somewhat analogous to the wretched condition we have in New England, where our forests are being ravaged by these moths. In my State we make an annual appropriation, and we employ a commissioner to see that that appropriation is properly applied. He has, I think, scores of men under him, paid from that appropriation, and it is used in conjunction with a Federal appropriation. My thought was that if the States where the boll weevil and other destructive insects exist are not cooperating with the General Government in rendering some financial assistance they ought to do so, just as we are doing in New England.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that policy has been consistently pursued by the Southern States. Contributions have been made by the States, in some instances by counties, by chambers of commerce, merchants, individuals, farmers, and others, I think, to an amount aggregating half a million dollars. I will say that the committee was in sympathy with the work being done by the State of New Hampshire, and in order to facilitate that work we have increased from 5 per cent to 25 per cent the allowance of the State of New Hampshire for whatever national forests may be situated in that State.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator, because I am not familiar with the fact, whether the present appropriation in this bill is an increased appropriation over that of last year for the extermination or the decrease of the depredations of the moths in our section of the country?

Mr. GORE. I shall be able to answer the Senator's question in a moment. I shall have to look into the matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the question for the reason that I notice that the appropriation for the boll weevil has been increased a quarter of a million dollars; and I wish to assure the Senator that in spite of all our efforts and appropriations from the individual States and the Federal appropriations, this miserable pest of the brown-tail and gypsy moth is going on. It seems to me it might be well to give a little additional appropriation in this bill for that purpose as well as for the extermination of the boll weevil.

Mr. GORE. I will say that the amount carried in the pending bill for the extermination of the moths referred to is the amount estimated for by the department. It is a slightly reduced appropriation as compared with last year.

Mr. GALLINGER. A slight reduction?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I regret that exceedingly. If it is the estimate, I shall not offer an amendment; but I wish the department would consult—or perhaps it did—with those who are very familiar with the situation in the New England States. I think if the department had done that it would not have reduced the appropriation, but, rather, would have increased it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I observe this appropriation "for investigations of insects affecting southern field crops, including insects affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar cane, and so forth." I regret to see anything of a purely jocular character creep into a serious bill of this character, and I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what is the particular use of including sugar cane? What is the necessity of protecting that crop in the South under the existing legislation?

Mr. GORE. I may say that I have a keen relish for the sense of humor always manifested by the Senator from Utah, and I wish to assure him that, in my judgment, the committee has not been guilty of discrimination. We have appropriated $41,000 for the investigation, among other things, of insects and diseases affecting the sugar beet.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think it might be a more practical thing if we would do something to protect sugar cane from the inroads of the Democratic Party, rather than to protect it from the attacks of these insects.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, efforts of that kind would do more harm than good. That is the difficulty connected with the administration of that principle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 48, line 20.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 48, line 21, where the committee proposes to strike out "$59,000" and insert "$84,000, of which sum $25,000 shall be immediately available."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 51, line 23, where the committee proposes to strike out the words "noxious animals" and insert:

Wolves, prairie dogs, ground squirrels, and other animals injurious to agriculture.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before we pass from that paragraph I wish to give notice that at the proper time I shall submit an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. After the word "marten," in line 1, page 52, the Senator from Illinois proposes to insert the following:

Provided, That the rearing or breeding of any such fur-bearing animals that are flesh-eating shall not be promoted or encouraged in any State or Territory of the United States in which poultry is raised or kept for use or profit near enough to expose such poultry to the depredations of such flesh-eating fur-bearing animals.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 52, lines 2 and 3, where the committee proposes to strike out:

That of this sum $15,000 shall be used for the destruction of ground squirrels on the national forests: And provided further.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah what is the trouble with the wild ducks of Salt Lake Valley? I see that the bill provides for them, and I want to find out what is the trouble with them.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that about 10,000,000 of them died within the last year and a half.

Mr. GALLINGER. That looks like a subsidy.

Mr. SMOOT. They have been suffering from some disease. It is not known what the disease is. The department has already had a man there examining into the matter.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 52, where it is proposed, after line 10, to insert:

For the improvement of the Mesa Verde National Park, $10,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice in this bill appropriations for the improvement of national parks, even one of the established national parks. Every year for the sundry civil appropriation bill the Secretary of the Treasury estimates the amount of money required for the care of national parks. In the past this class of appropriations has always been in that appropriation bill. Such appropriations ought to be in the sundry civil appropriation bill now rather than be placed in the Agricultural appropriation bill. I do not know why the committee included these items in this bill. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can tell the Senate why.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] will probably be able to explain this item to the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will try to explain it to the Senator, as this is an appropriation in relation to a national park in my State. There are three items for which appropriations are proposed. One is for the Mesa Verde National Park; another is for the Sullys Hill National Park in North Dakota, and the third is for the Platte National Park in the State of Oklahoma. So far as the necessity for an appropriation is concerned, I have received a letter from the superintendent of the Mesa Verde National Park and he states that they really need $75,000. That is a park to which a great deal of attention is being paid. It contains, as Senators know, the ruins of a prehistoric race that existed likely thousands of years ago. The buildings are there, and they have a palace there which contains over 50 rooms.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is a member of the Committee on Appropriations. As he is a new member he probably does not know that the national parks are provided for in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I know that.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator being a member of the Committee on Appropriations he can see that it would not be proper to have the item in this bill. The estimates come before the Committee on Appropriations when the sundry civil bill is considered, and I think that is the proper way to have this legislation. I ask the Senator to consent to have the item stricken out in order that we may take it up properly when the sundry civil appropriation bill is considered. I think he is probably a member of the subcommittee of that bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am not on the subcommittee, but, nevertheless——

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is on the committee, however.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado under what department is the administration of this park?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It has been administered under the Interior Department.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And not under the Agricultural Department?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is not under the Agricultural Department.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then we are appropriating money here in the Agricultural appropriation bill the expenditure of which would be carried on in the Interior Department.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but that is not out of the ordinary course. Take the appropriation bill of last year.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was not seeking to antagonize the Senator. I was seeking information.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If that has been the practice heretofore, it occurs to me that it is a very bad practice, because——

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be, but——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Because these estimates are usually made by the head of the department that has the expenditure of them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but I notice in the Agricultural appropriation bill last year that Wyoming got one in for $5,000.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not think it ought to have been in. I am not speaking of this from a personal standpoint. I ask the Senator this question, Does he think it is good business to put in the Agricultural appropriation bill an item of expenditure which has nothing to do whatever with the Agricultural Department and with which the Agricultural Department has nothing to do? Ought it not to go into the expenditures of the particular department or into a general bill applicable to all the departments?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It might be that would be true.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In other words, is it not loading up the expenditures of the Agricultural Department with items for which they are not properly chargeable?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It may be that it would have a tendency that way. Still at the same time there are appropriations which are absolutely necessary and greater amounts than probably some of the committees would authorize. It is not out of the usual practice, because there were two items in the appropriation bill of last year, one for the establishment and maintenance of a winter elk's refuge in the State of Wyoming, $5,000, to be available, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is under direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems not.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of Agriculture has that in charge.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know whether he has it in charge or not, but here is the establishment of these new parks and new preserves upon the lands embraced in the Sullys Hill National Park in North Dakota to be used as a permanent national range, $10,000.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Of course, if all these items are to be relegated to another committee, and if we are to get a fair showing there, it is all right and good; but if other people are to get appropriations here, I want my share, whatever it may be.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As I recall it, when the Agricultural appropriation bill was before the Senate in the last Congress, it dealt with a number of the national parks. I remember that we had several such items in that bill; one was with reference to elks in the park in Wyoming. Another had reference to Wind Cave National Park in my State, and the acquiring of some lands and fencing portions of it for bison and large game. That was all dealt with in the general Agricultural appropriation bill in the last Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. As the Senator from Utah says, they come under the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Wind Cave National Park?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think so.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There is no provision for it in this bill at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the attention of the Senator and of the Senate to the fact that the appropriation last year for the winter elk refuge in the State of Wyoming was $5,000, and——

Mr. CRAWFORD. That was in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason is that it is to be administered under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture. The amendment so states.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There was provision in reference to the Wind Cave Park.

Mr. SMOOT. I will call the attention of the Senator to the next item which was in that bill. There were only two in last year's bill. One was as follows:

> For the establishment of a national game preserve, to be known as the North Dakota National Game Preserve, upon the land embraced within the boundaries of the Sullys Hill National Park in the State of North Dakota, to be used as a permanent national range for elk, deer, and such other game animals and birds as may be placed therein, $10,000, to be available until expended; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to inclose the said game preserve with a good and substantial fence.

The difference is this, that the national parks are under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What is the provision for the one in my State? I do not recall about that.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not in this bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It was in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the Agricultural appropriation bill I have; the bill of last year.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It was in a later print of some bill. The bill which we passed had some such provision in it. My interest in the matter is like that of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

I do not want to have the cards shuffled, so that some of these items are going to be recognized in this bill and others left out, and which may be neglected entirely.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to say, in addition to what the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] has said, that there was a provision in the bill making an appropriation for various game preserves, one in Oklahoma, known as the Wichita Game Reserve; one in Montana, known as the National Bison Range; one in Wyoming, known as the Elk Refuge; and one the Senator from South Dakota has just referred to, being the National Game Preserve in South Dakota.

All these appropriations were made in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I will yield in just a moment. It is true that all lands which belong to the United States are under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior. We have in this appropriation bill several items where we appropriate money for experimental farms. The lands belong to the United States, and the lands which belong to the United States are under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior,

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that he is mistaken when he says that the national parks are under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of the Interior has direct charge of the management and control of the national parks.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the expenditure of the money.

Mr. SMOOT. And the expenditure of the money upon them. I will say to the Senator, further, that there has been introduced into the Senate, and also in the House, a bill to create a national-park bureau, so as to bring them all within the control of one management—that is, outside of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that the Sullys Hill Park is a national park. It is owned by the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I was unfortunate in what I said. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from North Dakota has never said that the national parks are under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture. The Senator from Utah misunderstood me. I said where they have these game preserves or these elk refuges the work is being done by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit that, Mr. President, because the bill specifically provides for that. But this is a matter relating to the Mesa Verde National Park. It is not a game preserve. There is no game there. It is created for the purpose of the Government preserving the wonderful relics found within the limits of that park. It is under the direct charge of the Secretary of the Interior. Nobody can go upon the park there unless under the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior. The Agricultural appropriation bill is no place for an appropriation for the improvement of that park.

Mr. GRONNA. Technically, that may be true; but I can see no reason why we should not make an appropriation for the improvement of the Mesa Verde National Park just as well as we make appropriations for other parks in this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Here is the trouble which arises: The Secretary of the Interior always sends his estimates to Congress. His estimates will be sent to the House of Representatives, to the Committee on Appropriation there, for the Mesa Verde National Park. The House Committee on Appropriations will probably put $10,000 in the bill for the Mesa Verde Park. Here is an appropriation from the Committee on Agriculture where the estimate was not made at all, and to put it in the bill may cause inextricable confusion.

For example, in the last Congress, as some Senators remember, there was an estimate sent down for an immediate appropriation on the legislative, executive, and judicial bill and we put it on. I happened to come up here one day and saw that there was on the Indian appropriation bill the very same appropriation which had been in the legislative bill, and it was being considered in the Indian appropriation bill. There must be regularity in these appropriation bills. They must be enacted according to the estimates sent down. If we do not do that, you will find in different appropriation bills various sums appropriated for the same object. If we do not have some regularity about it, the Senator will see the confusion that will arise and the duplicating of appropriations that will result.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, while the Sullys Hill National Park, so called, is under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, the proposed work must be done by the Agricultural Department. There can be no question about that. But before I proceed, I want to yield to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who desired to interrupt me.

Mr. JONES. I was just going to suggest that the provisions in the last Agricultural appropriation bill were not in reference to national parks at all. They were in reference to game preserves, the control of which I understand is under the Secretary of Agriculture, and those were entirely proper provisions.

Mr. GRONNA. That is true.

Mr. JONES. It is different with the provision in the pending bill when we make an appropriation for a national park over which the Secretary of Agriculture has no jurisdiction; but if it were a game preserve, the Secretary of Agriculture would have control of it.

Mr. GRONNA. The Sullys Hill National Park, so called, is a game preserve. It is to be used as a game preserve.

Mr. JONES. There is nothing at all in the bill to indicate that.

Mr. GRONNA. It was in the last year's bill.

Mr. JONES. For the Mesa Verde National Park I do not find any appropriation in the last Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. GRONNA. It was in the bill when it passed the Senate. I have the bill before me.

Mr. JONES. I have the law here.

Mr. GRONNA. It was probably taken out in conference, for it was in the bill when it passed the Senate.

Mr. JONES. On page 22 there is a provision for the maintenance for a game and bison range, and the Secretary of Agriculture has supervision of that. Of course, that was entirely proper. That was not a national park. It was a matter over which the Secretary of Agriculture had supervision. Another provision was:

> For the establishment and maintenance of a winter elk refuge in the State of Wyoming, $5,000, to be available until expended, and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to include in said refuge and to inclose not more than 1,000 acres of unoccupied public lands, which when selected shall be made to conform to the lines of the public surveys, and shall be adjacent to or partly inclosed by said refuge.

Of course, that is a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture. I do not know what was the provision that passed the Senate, but that is the way it was enacted into law. There is no provision in the law making an appropriation for a national park.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to read the provision in the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I will yield in just a moment. On page 54 of House bill 28283 as it passed the Senate last year there is this provision:

> For the establishment of a national game preserve, to be known as the North Dakota National Game Preserve, upon the land embraced within the boundaries of the Sullys Hill National Park in the State of North Dakota, to be used as a permanent national range for elk, deer, and such other game animals and birds as may be placed therein, $10,000, to be available until expended, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to inclose the said game preserve with a good and substantial fence, to construct thereon all necessary sheds, buildings, and corrals for the proper care and maintenance of the animals, to erect a suitable headquarters, to construct and maintain roads, trails, and other structures necessary for the convenience of visitors, and to incur such other expenses as may be necessary for the proper maintenance of the preserve and the animals placed therein.

There was an estimate made for this appropriation last year, and I have before me the statement made by the Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary Wilson, strongly recommending it.

Mr. JONES. I suggest that by the very language of this amendment this is not money for a national park, but it appropriates it for a game preserve, over which the Secretary of Agriculture would properly have control. The provision here is for the improvement of the Mesa Verde National Park. We might provide that a game preserve should be established in connection with it——

Mr. GRONNA. I was referring to the Sullys Hill National Park.

Mr. JONES. And then it would be a game preserve, but not a national park.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, I have not heard all of the discussion upon this subject, but it is perfectly plain that a national park, as such, should be under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, and national parks are usually provided for in another bill, the sundry civil appropriation bill. But these preserves that are to be stocked with game are located in parks, and so much as is under the Biological Bureau of the Agricultural Department has been taken care of in the Agricultural appropriation bills. Probably if we follow the line of action adopted heretofore we should only put in this bill provision for such items as are intended to provide for stocking certain portions of the parks with game. I think that that will be regulated sooner or later between the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GRONNA. And that could not be done under the bill, as suggested by some of the Senators who have just spoken.

Mr. BRADY. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. I do not think the objection made by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from North Carolina applies to the section referring to Sullys Hill National Park in the State of North Dakota.

Mr. SMOOT. We were discussing the Mesa Verde National Park.

Mr. BRADY. The objection of those Senators in the case of the Mesa Verde National Park is the fact that it comes under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, while the Sullys Hill National Park comes properly under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, since we have commenced to discuss the two items I might just as well conclude. I want to say, for the information of the Senate, that Sullys Hill National Park consists of about 780 acres, and I want to be permitted to read a short letter from Secretary Wilson. I ask the Secretary to read the letter, because he can read it much better than I.

Mr. OVERMAN. No one has made any point against the amendment, I understand.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply want to continue this subject, giving the information, if I may be permitted. Of course, if there is objection to it I can wait.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

FEBRUARY 1, 1913.

Hon. HENRY E. BURNHAM,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture and Forestry,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the Senate amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 28283), proposed by Senator GRONNA for the establishment of a national game preserve in North Dakota, on which you request a report.

This amendment proposes to appropriate $10,000 for the erection of fences, headquarters, and other buildings, and the construction of roads and trails necessary for the establishment and maintenance of the North Dakota National Game Preserve on the land in Sullys Hill National Park, N. Dak.

I inclose herewith a map showing the boundaries of this park. From information on file in the Biological Survey it appears that Sullys Hill Park, on the south shore of Devils Lake, N. Dak., was established in 1904 and has an area of about 780 acres. The land is partially wooded, well watered, and contains some excellent grazing ground. The highest point on the reservation, and the one from which it takes its name, Sullys Hill, attains an elevation of about 1,000 feet above the lake. Apparently no appropriation has ever been made for this reservation or any effort put forth to develop the park for any purpose. If inclosed with a suitable fence it would provide an excellent location for big game of various species characteristic of North Dakota, and the northern plains region, such as buffalo, elk, mule and white-tailed deer, and antelope. The reservation is ample for a herd of moderate size and affords abundant grass and water. The amount proposed is sufficient to construct the fence and necessary buildings. If the appropriation is made at this time the department is prepared to place on the reservation a herd of elk and can doubtless provide a few deer, so that no part of this sum need be expended for the purchase of animals. Once established, the preserve can be maintained at very moderate expense.

I especially call the attention of the committee to the fact that experience in the Yellowstone Park and the Wichita Game Preserve shows the importance of having herds of buffalo and other big game located at several widely separated points in order to prevent the spread among them of contagious diseases which may break out from time to time. The department has already under its jurisdiction small herds of buffalo and elk on the Wichita Game Preserve in Oklahoma, the National Bison Range in Montana, and the Niobrara Preserve in Nebraska. Congress has recently authorized the establishment of a preserve in the Wind Cave Park, in South Dakota. The North Dakota game preserve is smaller than any of the others and can be established and maintained at less cost. If Sullys Hill Park can be used for this purpose it will afford an opportunity of establishing a herd of big game, which can be utilized as a center of distribution for stocking other parks. It will also be a refuge for birds, including two species of grouse native to the region, will provide for the utilization of a reservation hitherto undeveloped, and will afford a park which will be a point of attraction for visitors from North Dakota and other States. The project has my approval as it is entirely feasible, economical, and is desirable from every point of view.

Respectfully,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, when this Mesa Verde National Park proposition is disposed of I shall ask to change the language.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask the Senator. Secretary Wilson in that letter asked for an appropriation of $10,000 to inclose the said park with a good and substantial fence; to construct thereon all sheds, buildings, and corrals necessary for the proper care and maintenance of the animals and birds therein; to erect a suitable headquarters; to construct and maintain roads, trails, and other structures necessary for the convenience of visitors, and so forth.

He states in the correspondence that that would be sufficient to do this work. I notice that the amendment offered in this bill carries exactly the same words, ostensibly for the same purpose.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that this item went out in conference. Several members of the conference objected to it.

Mr. SMOOT. And it did not become a law?

Mr. GRONNA. So it did not become a law. I ask unanimous consent to use the exact language that was used in last year's bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has it been estimated for by the present Secretary?

Mr. GRONNA. We have a favorable report from the Secretary. I have his letter.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Would it fill the purposes of the Senator if the amendment were amended on line 13, so as to insert after the word "of" the words "game preserves in," so as to read "for the improvement of game preserves in Sullys Hill National Park"?

Mr. GRONNA. I think that would do; but here is the language we used last year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not see the necessity of using those words or making any change. As has already been suggested, it is a small park, consisting of only 780 acres, and the idea is to use the entire park for this purpose. There has been no improvement of any kind for any purpose upon the park so far. As it provides for the fencing of the entire park, I can not see the necessity for the use of the words suggested by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It would only relieve my mind of the situation in this respect. I have tried to get the act creating the Sullys Hill National Park.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not a park at all; it is a game preserve. One would not call a tract of 780 acres a national park.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield to me just a moment until I finish my statement? I have assumed that it was a national park of 780 acres.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And as such I have assumed that it comes directly under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. Now, if that is true, my objection would be that the Secretary of the Interior having control of the park except where there is a game preserve made within the park, when the game preserve is made it comes under the control of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator I assume that this amendment, if passed, converts it into a game preserve, so that it would of its own effect, without any other words, convert the park into a game preserve.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If there is nothing but a game preserve there, I do not see how the amendment which I suggested is objectionable to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not objectionable, but I think it is unnecessary.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. "For the improvement of the game preserve in Sullys Hill National Park."

Mr. GRONNA. I had no objection to that, and I will accept it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That will meet my criticism.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, first, on the committee amendment, in lines 11 and 12, inserting the words "For the improvement of the Mesa Verde National Park, $10,000."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say a word in relation to that amendment. I have been assured by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] that this matter of an appropriation for the Mesa Verde National Park will surely come in the sundry civil appropriation bill. I will not be satisfied with the appropriation of $10,000 in this bill if I am to get nothing in the other bill. It is an historical point, and it should be fixed up in a manner that will attract people who come there and investigate the prehistoric conditions that are exhibited in that national park.

I should like to have the attention of the Senate to the fact that the ruins in this park were first discovered 30 or 40 years ago, and there have been European scientists who have come over to this country for the purpose of not only inspecting them, but one great scientist of Norway has written a book, which contains fully 650 pages with illustrations, as to the characteristics and the habits of the prehistoric race there disclosed. The park ought to be improved substantially and $10,000 is not enough. If the item properly belongs to the other appropriation bill, I do not care to press it in this bill; but I will take my chances to get a larger appropriation in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WEST. Are not all the three amendments here on all fours with each other?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think not. I think the amendment which the Senator from North Dakota is interested in is somewhat different.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is entirely different.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It involves the question of a game preserve which is within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture; but I think the third amendment is in the same category with the amendment in relation to the Mesa Verde Park.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad, Mr. President, that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has concluded to withdraw the amendment. It will doubtless be included in the sundry civil appropriation bill, and, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I shall be glad to cooperate with him in getting a larger appropriation than $10,000. From what the Senator from Colorado says, this is one of the most remarkable parks in the world and, of course, its investigation and development must come under the Interior Department, under the jurisdiction of the Smithsonian Institution, and under the active work of the archæologists belonging to that department of the Government. I think we can not do too much in reason toward thoroughly exploring that park and developing for the interests of science the wonderful things that doubtless will be found there, according to statements made by the Senator from Colorado. It belongs on the sundry civil bill, and it surely will be placed there when that bill comes up for consideration.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I withdraw the amendment in view of that statement.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as to the park in Wyoming in which the elk were inclosed, as well as the park in South Dakota where provision was made for bison, whether the biological feature in connection with those parks would require that those parks should be provided for in this bill rather than in the sundry civil appropriation bill? I ask the question of the Senator, knowing his long experience and familiarity with all of these different parks. I do not want to take chances in having that item left out of this bill and then having it claimed, when the sundry civil bill is under consideration, that on account of this feature it should have been provided for in the pending bill. Can the Senator from Wyoming advise me on the matter?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota does not find the Wyoming park provided for in this bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is not in this bill.

Mr. WARREN. That game preserve was provided for originally in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It was.

Mr. WARREN. And I have not asked to insert it here, because I have assumed that the appropriation made for the game was still operative, if not expended, and that the general appropriation for the park would be taken up by the Department of the Interior. I may be wrong about it, but that is what I have expected.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is the point. I would like to feel that we know what our status is, for if that appropriation should be in this bill I did not want to have it omitted.

Mr. WARREN. The sundry civil bill has not yet reached the Senate and has not been reported, I think, on the House side. I think it is perhaps at the present time in a state of incubation in committee.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It was claimed in the Committee on Appropriations when the matter was mentioned that it would probably come up on the sundry civil bill; so I did not press it here.

Mr. WARREN. That is the expectation. But I desire to say to the Senator——

Mr. CRAWFORD. While I have not pressed it here, I want it understood that the reason I have not done so is because of the claim made that it is a matter to be considered on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. WARREN. Let me suggest to the Senator that he call the personal attention of the Secretary of Agriculture to that condition in the park, and he might, if necessary, also call it to the attention of the Secretary of the Interior. We can do nothing until we see their estimates; but I presume both of those matters will be taken care of in the other bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, allow me to suggest to the Senator, that if the item goes out of this bill, he offer an amendment to the sundry civil bill, and then let it go to the Appropriations Committee, and they will consider it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is not going out of this bill, for it has not been placed in the bill. It was not placed in the bill because of the understanding expressed that it should properly be put on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota what is the park about which he is talking?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Wind Cave National Park at Hot Springs, S. Dak.

Mr. KENYON. Is the Wind Cave National Park protected by this bill in any way?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No; it is not.

Mr. KENYON. That is a park in the Senator's own State?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; and it is one of the parks which ordinarily come under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior to pay for the custodian and matters of that kind, and is provided for in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. I understand that it is not taken care of in this bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. A discussion arose here because of the fact that as to one of the parks in Wyoming and as to the park in which the Senator from North Dakota is interested provision was made for an inclosure of those parks for wild game, elk, and bison, and it was claimed that on that ground they were properly under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture and should be provided for in this bill.

Mr. KENYON. It would seem a great pity that anything should happen to the Wind Cave Park.

Mr. CRAWFORD. "That which we call a rose by any other name would smell as sweet."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK). The Chair understands that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GORE. I understand the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] preferred that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

The Secretary will read the next committee amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 52, after line 12, to insert the following:

For the improvement of Sullys Hill National Park, in the State of North Dakota, $10,000, the same to be available until expended. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to inclose the said park with a good and substantial fence, to construct thereon all sheds, buildings, and corrals necessary for the proper care and maintenance of the animals and birds therein, to erect a suitable headquarters, to construct and maintain roads, trails, and other structures necessary for the convenience of visitors, and to incur such other expenses as may be necessary for the proper maintenance of the preserve and the animals and birds placed therein. The Secretary of Agriculture is also authorized to place in the park buffaloes, elk, deer, and such other wild or rare animals and birds as he may in his discretion decide.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire where that park is located?

Mr. GRONNA. That park is located on the shores of Devils Lake, in the State of North Dakota.

Mr. KENYON. Is it a park now?

Mr. GRONNA. It was set aside for park purposes, but no improvements have as yet been made.

Mr. KENYON. The land is owned by the Government?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; the land is owned by the Government. I will now ask to amend the amendment, as suggested by the Senator from Wyoming, after the word "improvement," in line 13, by adding the words "as a game preserve."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, line 13, after the words "improvement of," it is proposed to insert the words "as a game preserve."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment passed over will be stated.

The next committee amendment passed over was, beginning at the top of page 53, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to improve Platte National Park, in the State of Oklahoma, by inclosing said park with a good and substantial fence, constructing thereon all sheds, corrals, and other buildings necessary for the proper care and maintenance of the animals and birds therein, erecting a suitable headquarters, and constructing and maintaining roads, trails, and other structures necessary for the convenience of visitors; to place in the park such wild or rare animals and birds as he may in his discretion decide, and to incur such other expenses as may be necessary for the proper care and maintenance of the park and the animals and birds therein, $5,000, which shall be available until expended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it seems to me that it would be well to insert the words "as a game preserve" after the words "National Park," and I offer that amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 53, line 2, after the words "Platte National Park," it is proposed to insert the words "as a game preserve."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it is my intention to propose an amendment on page 52, and I now ask that we recur to page 52.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask if the amendment proposed by the Senator is an original amendment or is it an amendment to a committee amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. It is an amendment to a committee amendment.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none. The Chair will suggest, however, that we finish the pending amendment, and then recur to the amendment to which the Senator from Arizona refers.

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. The amendment which I propose has been printed. On page 52, line 10, after the word "zones," I move to strike out the figures "$26,500" and to insert the figures "$31,500."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment has been agreed to, the Chair is advised. The Senator can move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I move to reconsider that vote.

Mr. WARREN. Will not the Senator from Arizona wait until the bill is concluded? He will then have an opportunity to propose that amendment.

Mr. WEST. Or the Senator will have that opportunity on the third reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. When the bill is reported to the Senate the Senator will have his opportunity to offer his amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. I will now make that motion, if it is in order.

Mr. WARREN. It is not now in order; but, if the Senator so desires, he can offer the amendment when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. It is in order until the Chair holds otherwise.

Mr. WEST. Would it be necessary to have a reconsideration in order to make an amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. Yes; but the Senator can offer his amendment in the open Senate before the third reading of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I am going to offer it now; and if possible am going to have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator from Arizona is getting a little warm over nothing at all, because——

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Arizona will not be swept off his feet.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Arizona allow me to finish my sentence? What I desired to say was that the Senator would be in perfect order without moving to reconsider, and he could then take all the time he wants by moving the amendment when the bill gets into the Senate from the Committee of the Whole, and I thought he would prefer to take that course.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Arizona is engaged in assisting in the preparation of a $12,000,000 Indian appropriation bill and does not purpose sitting around this Chamber hour in and hour out waiting to offer an amendment to this bill. If the amendment is not in order, it can be ruled out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will be in order if he moves to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, I move to reconsider that vote.

Mr. KENYON. In order to get information, so that we may properly vote on the question, I should like to inquire if the amendment relates to a national park?

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, no.

Mr. KENYON. If it related to a park it might be in order.

Mr. ASHURST. In the provision for conducting biological investigations and surveys to locate the habitat of and destroy prairie dogs and other harmful animals, which in some of the Western States have completely torn up the soil by the township and destroyed the grasses, I simply wish to have the appropriation increased from $26,500 to $31,500, so that the bureau having to do with biological investigations may have a sum of money sufficient to make a proper investigation to ascertain the locality of noxious animals, such as prairie dogs, with a view to their extermination.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator is not that covered by the preceding paragraph, on page 51?

Mr. ASHURST. I hardly think that the amount there is sufficient.

Mr. JONES. Prairie dogs are there mentioned specifically.

Mr. ASHURST. But the amount appropriated is not sufficient.

Mr. JONES. That provision reads:

> Including experiments and demonstrations in destroying wolves, prairie dogs, ground squirrels, and other animals injurious to agriculture.

I refer to the provision at the bottom of page 51.

Mr. ASHURST. As I have said, I hardly think that the amount is sufficient. I do not wish improperly to quote any official, but some very high officials of the Government have stated that they will need the sum of $31,500; that such amount is necessary to enable them to conduct the biological surveys with a view to exterminating animals that are so injurious to our native grasses and to agriculture in general.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ASHURST. I do.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that the appropriation in the preceding paragraph, which was increased $50,000 for the purpose of exterminating prairie dogs and other noxious animals, will cover the matter which he has in mind? It was my understanding at the time the bill was under consideration in the committee that the work contemplated by the Senator could be done under that appropriation.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not think so. If I thought so, it is manifestly true that I should not have proposed the amendment.

Mr. GORE. That is undoubtedly true, but I thought possibly the Senator's attention had not been called to it.

Mr. ASHURST. It has been called to my attention.

Mr. GORE. It was intended to cover the object which the Senator has in mind.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ASHURST. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. In the confusion I do not know whether I accurately understood the Senator. I inquire if the additional appropriation of $5,000 is to find out how to kill prairie dogs?

Mr. ASHURST. I assume that my friend from Kansas is not facetious and that he is asking for information. The amendment which I propose comes in on page 52, line 10, after the word "zones," to increase the appropriation from $26,500 to $31,500, so that there will be an ample fund for the purpose of conducting the biological investigations and surveys.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me a moment——

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. It may be very enlightening to those who live east of the Missouri River to talk about appropriating money to ascertain how to kill prairie dogs, but to one who knows anything about prairie dogs it is simply ridiculous, and it makes a bill like this assinine to talk about appropriating money to ascertain how to kill prairie dogs.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, almost everything that I ever said, did, or thought in the view of the Senator from Kansas is assinine.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I beg the Senator's pardon——

Mr. ASHURST. Anyhow, it is necessary for me to say these things.

Mr. BRISTOW. I beg the Senator's pardon. I am not reflecting on his knowledge of these things. It is better than mine, of course.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator could not do so.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I know I could not, and I would not try.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator had better not.

Mr. BRISTOW. But, in all seriousness, there may be some kinds of animals that the ordinary western farmer does not know how to kill, but a prairie dog is not one of them.

Mr. ASHURST. Perhaps the farmers of some States have made a deadly charge upon prairie dogs, and the Senator from Kansas may have led the charge; but I can not see why there should be any opposition to an amendment increasing the sum appropriated, so that the bureau having charge of this work will have a sufficient fund in order to ascertain the habitat and eliminate these injurious animals. I mentioned prairie dogs among them; and while they may not do much damage in Kansas they have, at least to my certain and positive knowledge, in the northeastern part of the State of Arizona uprooted and destroyed the grass in township after township. If it be an unworthy purpose to try to provide means looking to their extermination, if my attempt to include this amendment in this bill is an unworthy effort, then I do not have the same idea of public duty that some other Senators, and especially the Senator from Kansas, possess.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think if we look to the Federal Government to help us kill prairie dogs that we are getting paternalism down pretty fine; I never heard of an appropriation of that kind before.

Mr. ASHURST. I am astonished to hear my Progressive friend talk about paternalistic government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ASHURST. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Kansas will turn to page 51, he will observe that an amendment has already been agreed to which provides, among other things, for the destruction of prairie dogs. That ought to come out of the bill if it is unnecessary. I want to ask the Senator from Arizona whether or not this increased appropriation has been estimated for? As the bill came from the House it provided an appropriation of $21,500 for biological investigations, including the relations, habits, geographic distribution, and migrations of animals and plants, and the preparation of maps of the life and crop zones.

The committee has increased that amount $5,000, making the appropriation $26,500. I will ask the Senator if the department has recommended a larger sum than that contained in the bill? On the contrary, it occurs to me that probably the estimate is for the amount put in by the House, although I do not know.

Mr. ASHURST. So far as I am advised at this time, there may not have been made an estimate as required by the rules of the Senate or by law. Of course, I realize that if any Senator makes the point of order, I believe the amendment is obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. It follows, of course, Mr. President, that if it has not been estimated for or reported by a standing or select committee of the Senate, it is obnoxious to the rule; but I will not invoke the rule. I simply wanted to call attention to that fact.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas, if the Senator from Kansas will hear me, to the fact that on page 51 of the bill there is found this language:

> For investigating the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry, including experiments and demonstrations in destroying noxious animals and for investigations and experiments in connection with rearing of fur-bearing animals, including mink and marten, $75,000.

That is the way in which the provision passed the House. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate amended the language by striking out the words "noxious animals" and inserting "wolves, prairie dogs, ground squirrels, and other animals injurious to agriculture," and by increasing the appropriation to $125,000.

It seems that when questions of this kind come up some Senator appears to enjoy being facetious at the expense of a fellow Senator. I as one Senator disapprove of that action. The Senator from Arizona has a right to ask that there be a specific appropriation made for the destruction of these noxious mammals. The Senator from Arizona is entirely justified in asking for this appropriation, because any man who knows anything about this mammal knows that it is a most destructive one. Will any Senator on this floor give the formula to eradicate it?

Mr. BRISTOW. That is, the prairie dog?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; the prairie dog. The Senator from Arizona, Mr. President, has a perfect right to ask the Senate to increase this appropriation, because it is in the interest of the people who live on the lands where these mammals are to be found.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. The prairie dog is an awful animal out in our country, it is true, and we ought to have a lot of money to kill him. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, something is the matter with the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRISTOW. We have an animal out there that gets in the alfalfa fields, noses around, kills the alfalfa occasionally, and works the ground up. We call such animals gophers. It is a little hard to get them out of the alfalfa fields when they get in; but I never thought about having the Government send experts out there to turn the gophers out of our alfalfa fields.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, will the Senator from Kansas inform the Senate how successfully to destroy the prairie dog?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from North Dakota will go out to any intelligent farmer in central or western Kansas, he will give him all the information that he wants. That farmer is not asking the Government to send an agent out there to instruct him in the matter; he has learned that lesson long ago.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator that I have not time to go out and ask the farmers of Kansas for the information; but I thought the Senator from Kansas might give us that information. In the southwestern part of North Dakota I have seen whole townships where these destructive animals were doing their damaging work.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, yes; I have seen a great many prairie-dog towns out in Kansas. The farmer who has a prairie-dog town on his place, if he wants to destroy it, if the prairie-dog community is a big one, goes to the drug store and purchases some gas or liquid, which he takes and pours down the hole, and the prairie dogs or gophers do not appear any more in that vicinity. It is a very easy and simple process, and there is not one farmer in a thousand who is ever bothered with them who does not know just how to get rid of them. It seems to me that this is a strained effort to get more appropriations to give somebody some jobs.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me, with the permission of the Senator from Arizona, I want to ask the Senator from Kansas if the Kansas farmer pours the liquid down the throat of the animal or down the hole in the ground? [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to use a moment or two of the time that I have.

Mr. BRISTOW. For the information of the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Arizona, I will say to these two "tenderfeet" who have wandered to the West in recent years that a prairie dog is very hard to shoot. [Laughter.] I would not advise undertaking to kill him with a revolver; that is somewhat difficult; but to move on a prairie dog with a jug full of poisonous gas and drive him off the prairie and into a hole and chloroform him, so that he never comes out again, is not a very difficult feat to perform. I do not think we ought to have the Army and Navy called out to suppress him; nor do I believe it is necessary to have any very large appropriation to enable the Federal Government to give instructions along that line.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I rose in good faith to propose an amendment. The Senator from Kansas grows facetious—and I have no objection to that—but he made a statement during his remarks just now which I resent. He said that this proposed amendment looked to him like an attempt to give "somebody some jobs." A statement of that kind can issue from no one except one whose brains lie at the root of his tongue; and if that statement was meant in that way, to insinuate that my motive, sir, in trying to secure this small appropriation was to secure anybody a job, I denounce the statement as unworthy of being made in the Senate, and I specifically here denounce the Senator who would presume to say it. The Senator from Kansas ought not to say that he believes or suspects that this amendment was introduced for the purpose of securing somebody some jobs. It is false, sir; and you falsify if you say it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think Rule XVIII ought to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is out of order.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, he is out of order; but he repeats what he said, that a Senator who says that the purpose of the amendment is unworthy, falsifies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will be required to take his seat under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am not at all disturbed by the emphasis of the Senator from Arizona. I am sure that I was undertaking to give some valuable information on the killing of prairie dogs, which seemed to be a problem here of very grave concern to the Federal Government. So far as the appropriation being for the purpose of giving somebody some jobs is concerned, I did not think the Senator from Arizona had an army of constituents who were intent upon trying to get on the Federal pay roll. Of course no Senator has friends who want to get on the Federal pay roll; that is something that does not happen in this country of ours. There are very few people who would presume to accept a Federal position if it were open to them, especially from the State of Arizona, and I am sorry that my friend should show such heat about this matter. It is certainly painful to me to have said anything that in any way gave offense to my friend from Arizona. I did not intend that, and if he has no constituents who want to get these good places which are provided for in these appropriation bills he is a fortunate man, and I am very glad that he is in such a comfortable position.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to call attention to the fact that the Government is already expending large sums of money in exterminating the ground squirrel, and I do not know how many other animals of that kind. This is being done by the Health Department of the Government, on the ground that the ground squirrel is the purveyor of the bubonic plague. They have an assistant surgeon in San Francisco now who is giving practically all of his time to the particular subject of exterminating the ground squirrel in our State. I suppose they are doing the same thing in other Western States.

I am not able to say how much money has been expended in that way, but it has been considerable. By some sort of an arrangement between the Health Department and the city organizations and county organizations of California they have joined in raising the necessary funds for the purpose—half and half. The Health Department is undertaking to exterminate the squirrel because he is a purveyor of disease, and the farmers are contributing their share because he destroys their crops. I know that a good deal of money is being expended by the Government in that way, and I think that ought to be considered in making any appropriation under this bill.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I see that the committee has already made two amendments in this section—one of $50,000 and the other this very item of $5,000—thereby increasing the total by $55,000 over the amount carried by the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment, on page 52, line 10, was adopted. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Chair state the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment in line 10, page 52, was adopted. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], who is necessarily absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I inquire whether the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CRAWFORD (after having voted in the negative). I inadvertently voted in the absence of my pair. I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. KERN (after having voted in the affirmative). I understand the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], with whom I am paired, has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES. I inquire whether the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a general pair with that Senator. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I find that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], with whom I have a pair, is not present. I transfer the pair to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is absent from the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON]. They all have pairs.

Mr. WALSH. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider is rejected. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is the amendment of the committee at the top of page 64, where it is proposed to insert the following item:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the existence of artesian water suitable for irrigation in the semiarid regions by boring wells, $100,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on what page is that amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. I have an amendment to offer to that amendment. After the word "the," in line 2, I propose to insert the words "arid and," so that the amendment will read:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the existence of artesian water suitable for irrigation in the arid and semiarid regions by boring wells, $100,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, before the word "semiarid," to insert the words "arid and."

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to offer a small amendment or interlineation. After the word "water," in line 2, I move to insert "and other underground water supplies." That will cover the underflow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "water," in line 2, page 64, it is proposed to insert "and other underground water supplies."

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the proposed amendment may be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. Did the Secretary say that the amendment on page 64 was the next amendment passed over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I call attention to the amendment on page 57, which, I understood, was passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Which one does the Senator refer to?

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment reading:

That hereafter the powers conferred and the duties imposed by law on the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture shall be exercised and performed by the Bureau of Crop Estimates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The record shows that that amendment was agreed to on April 30.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, of course, I made a mistake in my record.

The SECRETARY. On page 68 the committee amendments in the paragraph relative to demonstrations on reclamation projects were passed over.

The first amendment is in line 19, after the word "demonstrations," where it is proposed to strike out the word "and" and to insert the word "and" after the word "advice," on the same line, so as to read "through demonstrations, advice, and in other ways."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On line 20, after the word "projects," it is proposed to insert the words "and elsewhere."

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee why those words were put in. The whole paragraph purports to refer to settlers on reclamation projects.

Mr. GORE. That is true, and that is the reason why the amendment was reported. My own State will serve as an illustration. Oklahoma has contributed something more than $6,000,000 to the reclamation fund. We have now no public lands. As a rule the department has used the reclamation fund only in States where there was public land or public domain. It is my judgment and the judgment of others that a great deal can be done in the way of stimulating irrigation on a small scale in the semiarid country by encouraging farmers along the streams to cooperate in establishing small plants instead of these large plants costing millions of dollars; and I thought this might be serviceable in rendering it possible for the department to investigate or experiment along those lines.

Mr. JONES. The only reason I asked the question was that the language immediately preceding it confines this work to the Government reclamation projects.

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me it would have been better to have so changed the preceding language as to accomplish what the Senator desires, to which I have no objection myself.

Mr. GORE. I think this will probably accomplish the purpose. I took up the matter with the Assistant Secretary. Of course, I am not sure the department will undertake the work, but I wanted to make it possible if they should deem it deserving of consideration.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not intend to take more than a moment of time, but before this bill passes I wish to enter a general protest. I do not want to arouse the anger or antagonism of anybody by venturing to utter that protest, but it seems to me this bill contains many items which are utterly unjustifiable.

When we propose to employ Government experts to go out along little streams and tell the farmers that they ought to engage in irrigation, assuming that the farmer himself does not know anything, it seems to me we are going some distance in the way of paternalism. Moreover, I think it is an utter waste of money. When the Federal Government spends money for the purpose of bringing into this country seeds and plants from other countries, for the purpose of experimenting with them and ascertaining whether or not they are suitable to our climatic conditions, I believe it is engaged in a great and practical work, which will be of general benefit; and so I might extend that general illustration through many activities of the Agricultural Department. There is a class of experimentation and a class of scientific knowledge that is legitimately and properly carried on by a government, because it is expensive and difficult, and is, if successful, of general benefit; but somewhere a line ought to be drawn. It ought to be assumed that it is not the duty of the Federal Government to enter into every activity in life and to undertake to regulate everything in the world. It ought to be assumed that a farmer living along a stream will ascertain and know whether or not he can utilize the waters of that stream. My opinion is—and I express it but modestly—that he is very likely to discover the facts much quicker than a Government expert.

When we go to appropriating money for the purpose of exterminating prairie dogs and for the purpose of doctoring wild ducks—and there is such an item in this bill—for the purpose of catching ground squirrels, for the purpose of hunting down gophers, for the purpose of discovering the best means of trapping chipmunks, and for the purpose of doing a hundred other useless things—for they are practically useless—it seems to me we might as well extend them and appropriate a few million dollars to exterminate field mice and to study the habits of centipedes. It would be much more in line with broad national policies if we appropriated a few hundred thousand dollars to exterminate bedbugs and kindred vermin. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are national in character, and I think it would be more appropriate. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I thought I would touch a responsive chord in the Senator who has just spoken when I mentioned that matter.

Where are we going to stop? Everybody knows that in a new country there are some gophers. Their trapping furnished the chief amusement of my illustrious youth. There is an occasional ground squirrel; and as I have read the provisions of this bill, I have wondered what is to remain for the amusement and delectation and mental and moral uplift of the youth of the future if he is to be deprived of the privilege of drowning out ground squirrels and choking them to death in the old-fashioned way. How long, O Lord, how long is this to continue?

As a country becomes populated the gopher disappears, and if he does not disappear of his own volition, the farm hand and the yellow dog get him. I am not much acquainted with this individual known as the prairie dog; but I take it that if there is anybody living on the land he will not be very long in getting rid of the prairie dog as long as arsenic and strychnine are reasonably cheap.

I undertake to say that the talk of economy is turned into a satire or a farce when we read the provisions of this bill. Take the matter of wolves: If there are many people living in a country, there will not be many wolves living in that country.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me for a moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. As to wolves, the United States has reserved about a third of the State in which I live and from a quarter to two-thirds of some of the other States. It has created great forest reserves there. It is renting portions of them to sheep and cattle men, and is receiving a large income in that way. The States surrounding those reserves make large appropriations, amounting to anywhere from $40,000 to $125,000 each per year, for destroying wolves, which would otherwise destroy the cattle and sheep; but the Government, with its forest reserves, furnishes a breeding ground for the wolves. While it gets this revenue from the sheep and cattle men, and the sheep and cattle men are taxed in their States, although the Government is not taxed at all, to eradicate these animals or for any other purpose; yet the Government goes on allowing the wolves to breed. The proposition is that the Government shall do something as the owner of the land, and not leave all of the burden upon the settlers, who have to pay both their taxes and their rental to the Government.

Mr. REED. Then, Mr. President, if this bill were limited to the extermination of these animals upon Government land that it is withholding from settlement, that question would be presented, and the Senator might justly advance the argument he has made.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that that is the intention, and that only, so far as wolves are concerned.

Mr. REED. That may be the intention; but, so far as I am concerned, I have gotten tired of having an intention rest in the inner consciousness of somebody or some body of men. There is no such purpose expressed in this law.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will understand that I am only expressing myself as to the one matter of wolves in making the short statement I have made, the point of which, I think, the Senator will see.

Mr. REED. I see it very plainly.

Mr. WARREN. I do not believe there is any danger whatever of so much of this money as may be used for that purpose being expended anywhere except in the Government reserves.

Mr. REED. I am going to call attention to this language in a moment—indeed, I shall do so now:

For investigating the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry—

I have no objection to that, because it might be of general benefit—

including experiments and demonstrations in destroying wolves, prairie dogs, ground squirrels, and other animals injurious to agriculture, and for investigations and experiments in connection with rearing of fur-bearing animals, including mink and marten, $125,000.

Of course in the general clause I suppose skunks and muskrats would be included, and while we are propagating those, the rich and valuable furs of the prairie dog are to be destroyed, because we are going to kill the animal. I assume that its fur is rich and valuable, and probably it is, inasmuch as it is worn.

There is no limitation there, as the Senator from Wyoming seems to think, for the use of this money upon Government reservations. There is no limitation to it of any kind. It can be used anywhere; and, under the general language, it can be used for investigations and experiments in the killing of other animals injurious to agriculture, which, of course, takes in the field mouse, the blind mole, and all the other vermin of earth, if somebody in the Agricultural Department concludes that they are injurious to agriculture.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me there?

Mr. REED. In just one moment. Then we propose to go to raising minks and martens and other fur-bearing animals. I say there is no limitation whatever; we are not to do this on Government reservations; we do it everywhere; and while we specify a few animals, we can do it with any animal. Common house mice, at least field mice, could come within its purview. I am not sure but under a liberal construction we could go to breeding common gray cats.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is probably right about the method in which the money can be used, in the way it is appropriated. Special funds make provision for certain experiments, and they have been permitted to the different Secretaries of Agriculture. I am so confident that under the present administration and under the present Secretary of Agriculture we will be perfectly safe in having the money expended as it should be that I am satisfied to accept the language.

The Senator knows that we have to give some latitude to the different Secretaries. For instance, we are using $40,000,000 up in Alaska in building a railroad. A lump sum goes to one of the department heads. He can expend it for switches or ties or railroads, where he chooses.

The Secretary of Agriculture, of course, we assume, first, has common sense; second, that he has judgment; and third, that his intentions are honorable and straight. The only place, of course, to operate upon wolves—and that is one of the subjects—would be in their own possessions, on the lands belonging to the United States, in the forest reserves.

Mr. REED. If the Senator pleases, why would that be the only place to operate?

Mr. WARREN. As far as destroying the animals is concerned, it would hardly be competent for the United States Government to take possession of private property.

Mr. REED. They would not have to take possession of private property to study the habits of the wolf. They might put one of their experts out on a basswood log anywhere and let him sit there observing the habits of wolves for the next 12 months and invade no one's private property. I seldom find that a bad law is proposed but somebody rises up and tries to cover the imperfections of the bad law by asserting that it is going to be enforced by a very good man.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not deny that?

Mr. REED. I agree that the Secretary of Agriculture is a very good man, and I apprehend at the same time that he would not know how to catch a gray wolf or to trap a coyote to his lair unless he had more guides than it took to lead Roosevelt to the undiscovered river that had already been located on the map. [Laughter.]

I agree with the proposition that wolves ought not to be allowed to be reared upon land that is withheld from public settlement. I do not refer to a park. If our Government will adopt the policy of letting human beings go on the land and cultivate it and farm it, the farm boys will take care of the wolf proposition.

As far as I am concerned, I embrace this opportunity to say in a very few words that I believe the best kind of conservation there is or ever has been of the lands or the resources of the country is to let human beings go on the land and turn the forest into farms and the desert into gardens. They will produce more of value every twelvemonth than existed there in the 50 years that preceded their entry.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will yield to me, I will state that in my State 40 per cent of the forest reserves are above the timber line, where no timber can grow, and that 30 per cent of the forest reserves are between the zone where no timber can grow and where only scrub timber grows. Thus 70 per cent of the forest reserves in my State have no relation whatever to forests.

Mr. REED. Can it be put to some use by man?

Mr. SHAFROTH. They get many of the most valuable mines in the zone above timber line.

Mr. REED. How much of this appropriation of $125,000 are we going to expend in raising minks? How much of it are we going to expend in propagating marten, and other animals? Are we not going in this bill, not only in this item but in item after item, to the very extreme of absurdity? Are we not doing with the taxpayers' money what not one of us would do with our own money?

I see my friend the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] over there smiling, and good-natured as he usually is. It recalls to my mind the fact that a few years ago I used to ride across Kansas going out to the western country and when we reached a little distance beyond the eastern line we began to strike prairie dog towns and we began to see jack rabbits and sagebrush. But Kansas enterprise solved that problem. Kansas farms began to encroach and when the Kansas farmer came the prairie dog left. I think the Kansas Senator was eminently correct when he said they did not need to be taught how to kill prairie dogs out in Kansas. There is no prairie dog town in the world that would not pick up and emigrate over night if it saw even one Kansan advancing toward it. There is no courage, no enterprise, and no stubborness that has ever stood in the way of the onslaught of the Kansan, particularly when he gets a move on him.

But speaking seriously, I say the citizens of Kansas solved this question of farm vermin. They plowed the ground; they brought their families; they planted their crops, and prairie dog towns moved on west and disappeared just as all this sort of pestiferous vermin disappears in the face of advancing civilization.

If there was any great evil overshadowing the country, if the prairie dogs were massing themselves in armies and about to sweep over our land and devastate our plains and depopulate our cities, we might find it necessary to employ a few Government experts to study their habits, to investigate their plans, and to ascertain their deadly methods. But the prairie dog is moving in the other direction. I presume some of them have gotten out into Arizona by this time, and my friend who so earnestly advocates this measure can find solace in the fact that when they begin to cultivate more land in Arizona there will be less prairie dogs, and the more people they have the less need there will be for legislation of this character.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Is there anything in the Baltimore platform on the subject of prairie dogs? [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. If there was I am very sure that most of the gentlemen on this side would be performing the solemn act of recantation. [Laughter.] The difference is that on this side we recant and on the other side you repudiate.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator will explain the difference.

Mr. REED. One of them is a little franker than the other. Our method at least carries with it something of a tearful and penitential mood. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. And one of them can be performed a little more quickly than the other also. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. No Democrat ever repudiated his platform without feeling the compunctions of conscience, while with our friends upon the other side, nobody has ever accused them of possessing that quality of conscience which is capable of being disturbed. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator will tell us what other differences there are between the Republicans and Democrats.

Mr. REED. I do not know of any great differences, except in the habit. The Democratic habit naturally is to try and keep close to the people. Turn a Democrat loose and he goes back home to his folks. Turn a Republican loose and he heads for the citadels of the corporations. There is that fundamental difference. [Laughter.] We get our inspiration from the cottages and hamlets and villages of the land, and our Republican friends for about 50 years got theirs from Wall Street. And they still have their ears to the ground. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. Is there any appropriation for the improvement of these conditions?

Mr. REED. The people of the United States made an appropriation a few months ago when they went to the polls, which has improved conditions in a marked degree. [Laughter.] At the present time it looks as though the good work would go on indefinitely. The only sorrow I feel is that I look over at my good friends upon the other side and feel how I have enjoyed their society, and wonder if I am to have the pleasure of meeting them when Congress assembles after the next general election.

But, Mr. President, I am very serious about the proposition that this bill appropriates hundreds of thousands of dollars that will be, in my judgment, practically wasted, and I am not in favor of increasing a single item over the amount passed by the House except it be an item that is to produce a practical result and for which good cause can be shown.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I sympathize with what has been said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in criticism of the general scope of the bill. If we keep on at the rate we are going, we are likely to bankrupt this country. If the Government were a private corporation, it would be in the hands of a receiver very soon. There are appropriations made, or attempted to be made, that to my mind are absolutely absurd. Let me call attention to one of them. I have not had very much to do with the formation of bills of this kind, because I have never been on the committee nor on the Committee of Appropriations, but I notice on page 63 of the bill this appropriation:

Irrigation investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the laws of the States and Territories as affecting irrigation and the rights of appropriators, and of riparian proprietors and institutions relating to irrigation, and upon the use of irrigation water at home and abroad, with especial suggestions of the best methods for the utilization of irrigation waters in agriculture, and upon the use of different kinds of power and appliances for irrigation, and for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on irrigation, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, supplies, and all necessary expenses, $106,400.

Mr. President, what has the National Government to do with this question of irrigation laws to begin with? It is purely a State matter. There are no Federal irrigation laws. The right to the use of water is controlled by State laws entirely, but the National Government is constantly attempting in some way to get into the control of affairs which belong to the States, and this is one of the instances of that kind.

It ought to be an easy matter for anyone to find out what is the law of any State with respect to irrigation, and only the property owners of that State are interested in the question.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator from California will permit me, I wish to state right here that there are two or three well-known codifications of the irrigation laws of the States which occupy the arid region of the country where irrigation is practiced and which perhaps are better prepared for general use than would be prepared by the so-called expert work proposed to be done under the appropriation the Senator is criticizing.

Mr. WORKS. I have no doubt about that. There is no difficulty about finding out what the laws of the different States are in respect to irrigation. They are codified in various ways. The idea of undertaking to employ experts at the expense of the Government to teach us how to irrigate land is equally absurd.

I happen to represent in part a State that resorts to irrigation very extensively. I think probably the farmers in my State know about as well how to irrigate their lands as any expert that might be sent from Washington.

The experts, if they go out, will probably learn something from the farmers who are practically at work irrigating their lands. They do not need any information from experts. They have learned from experience how to irrigate their lands, and irrigate them successfully. They have learned what are the best means to resort to for that purpose.

There is not the slightest reason, in my judgment, for the making of these appropriations for any such purpose. They want the experts to suggest the best methods for the utilization of irrigation waters in California. Now, for whom? That is not a national question; it is a State question; the laws are State laws.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. This relates, of course, to the reclamation lands that are being reclaimed by the Government, and which are opened to homestead settlement from time to time. Of course, as the Senator suggests, farmers who have learned from experience how to irrigate need no instruction on the subject; but many of the new settlers do not have that information, and irrigation is a considerable art; it sometimes requires several seasons for settlers to learn how to irrigate. It was felt that possibly, as the Government was spending $60,000,000 to reclaim this land, it might be of service to teach the new settler how to irrigate the first year or the second year without loss of time; at least it was thought possible that the money might be expended in that direction where settlers lack experience.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma is entirely mistaken. This provision is not confined to the public lands; it is in no way confined to the Reclamation Service. So far as the provision itself is concerned, it has no reference to or connection with the Reclamation Service, and if it did have such reference it is just as unnecessary. The reclamation projects are established by the Government; they have expert engineers in the conduct of their buildings and the preparation of those lands for irrigation purposes who are just as good experts as can be found anywhere in this country.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. GORE. If the Senator from California will observe, the act says "the Government reclamation projects"; that is, the Government of the United States, the projects for which $60,000,000, I believe; has been expended; indeed, I believe $80,000,000 has been expended on these projects, or that sum is in the course of expenditure. It was, in the first place, limited to those projects, and not to private projects, not to those that are receiving attention at the hands of the State of Colorado, and not to the farmers who do not need the information.

Mr. WORKS. I will say again that if that is the intention of the committee this bill will have to be amended, because it is not limited in that way at all. The Senator from Oklahoma will not find any provision in the bill where it is limited to irrigation and reclamation projects. That is only an instance, Mr. President, of the presence of numerous other appropriations which are proposed in this bill that are equally without merit. I should suppose that when we get through with the bill the question as to whether it should be passed at all with all of these provisions in it ought to be taken up very carefully by the Senate.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a pending amendment. Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky an amendment to that amendment?

Mr. JAMES. No; the amendment I propose is to come in on page 20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a pending committee amendment.

Mr. JAMES. I thought that amendment had been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; it is before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. JAMES. Then let the amendment which I propose lie on the table, and I will call it up later.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I am unwilling to let the discussion of the appropriation for the destruction of noxious animals pass without suggesting that I introduced the amendment providing for an increase of $50,000 over the amount allowed by the other House for the destruction of noxious animals. I introduced that amendment for the purpose of having the amount carried by it expended in the destruction of wolves and other noxious animals, principally in the State of Texas, where there are no United States public lands, and I want this understood. I did not want to allow the matter to pass without making this statement. I believe it is just as allowable to expend money for destroying wolves and other animals that infest ranches and farms as for destroying the boll weevil and similar pests. There is crying need for the aid of the Department of Agriculture in destroying wolves and similar noxious animals in large sections of Texas at the present time. The knowledge of this need prompted me to introduce the amendment for an additional sum of $50,000 for this work.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the committee amendment. It is to come in on page 68, line 22, after the figures "$50,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not the amendment now pending. The amendment now pending is, in line 20, page 68, to insert the words "and elsewhere"; quite an unimportant amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought that amendment had been agreed to and that we had reached the other amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, in line 20, page 68.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee which was passed over.

The next amendment of the committee passed over was, on page 68, line 22, to strike out the numerals "$25,000" and to insert "$50,000, of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I first wish to offer an amendment to the amendment, after the numerals "$50,000," to strike out the words "of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available."

I want to say to the Senator having the bill in charge that that is virtually an appropriation that should be taken care of by the deficiency bill. It is not to reach into the next fiscal year at all, but it is to be used before the 30th day of June of this year. There will be a deficiency bill here, and, if it is absolutely necessary, it can be taken care of in that bill and not in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to the committee amendment. [Putting the question.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the Chair is putting the question so that we are to vote on the committee amendment or on the amendment to the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is putting the question on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the committee amendment. The ayes seem to have it; the ayes have it, and the amendment to the committee amendment is agreed to. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment as amended.

Mr. KENYON. May we have the amendment stated, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as amended.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, line 22, it is proposed to strike out "$25,000" and to insert "$50,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. GORE. I call for a division.

The question being put, on a division the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment passed over.

The next amendment of the committee passed over was, on page 69, line 1, to strike out the word "Land" and to insert the word "Farming," so as to read:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with and make an exhibit at the next annual meeting of the International Dry Farming Congress, to be held at Wichita, Kans., during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, illustrative of the investigations, products, and processes relating to farming in the subhumid region of the United States, including labor and all expenses in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $20,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, was the amount of $20,000 agreed to in the amendment which has just been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amount was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. The whole amendment went over. I want to ask the Senator having this bill in charge when this Dry Farming Congress meets in Wichita, Kans.?

Mr. GORE. I think it convenes about the 22d or 23d of October. The junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] can state the exact date of its meeting, but I think, as I have stated, it is about the 22d or 23d of October.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, why make this appropriation immediately available?

Mr. GORE. I think it is possible they have had to construct temporary buildings of some kind.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the appropriation has been actually passed, with a view of it passing?

Mr. GORE. Not before the appropriation has been actually passed, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. It has not been passed up to this time.

Mr. GORE. No; it has not. I suppose they want to begin the work of construction and preparation, as the exposition occurs in October. I presume they thought it was wise to construct buildings now and to make temporary preparations.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say that if the appropriation were not available now, of course, just as soon as the fiscal year closes it would be available; that would be the 1st day of July. Appropriations are generally made in that way, but I simply asked the question to learn from the Senator as to when the congress was to be held. Would it not be just as well to allow the bill to carry the appropriation and make it available on the 1st day of July?

Mr. GORE. That may be true, but the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] will know better than I happen to know as to that. If it be true, I am perfectly willing that the amendment be adopted, because I do not like to encourage the practice of making appropriations immediately available.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if it would not be just as well to make this a straight appropriation, and not make it immediately available?

Mr. THOMPSON. In relation to that matter, I will state that it is considered necessary to have the money so as to make the exhibit, but I think it will suffice if the amount does not become available until the 1st of July. I understand there is no objection to the amendment of the committee increasing the amount to $20,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I will leave that matter to be thrashed out between the House and the Senate; I do not know enough about it to say whether $10,000 or $20,000 is too much, but I do believe the words "to be immediately available" ought to be stricken from the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the words "to be immediately available," in line 7, page 69, be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah moves to strike out the words "to be immediately available," in line 7, page 69.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator understands that that will have to be done by unanimous consent or else we will have to turn back to the item after the bill shall have been reported to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that. I ask unanimous consent, inasmuch as it is not a committee amendment, that those words be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the vote will be taken. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to strike out the words "to be immediately available," in line 7, on page 69.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee increasing the amount from $10,000 to $20,000.

Mr. THOMPSON. I simply want to say that this is the amount that was estimated by the department as necessary to make the exhibit.

Mr. SMOOT. That is $20,000?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next committee amendment passed over is on page 70, line 14, to strike out "$50,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in the purchase of animals for breeding purposes," and insert:

Including the erection of such temporary farm buildings as may be found necessary, and for the employment of persons and means necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $100,000, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell in the open market or to exchange for other live stock or farm products to the best advantage, without the usual condemnation proceedings and public auction, such live stock or farm products as cease to be needed: Provided, That all moneys received from the sale of such live stock or farm products, or as a bonus in the exchange of the same, shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts: Provided further, That in any State in which this work is undertaken sufficient suitable land for the necessary experiments is made available to the Secretary of Agriculture for the required period of time without cost to the Department of Agriculture, and that the State live-stock sanitary laws are enforced by the State in such manner as to justify the Secretary of Agriculture in the expenditure of money for the purpose of encouraging live-stock production.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I inquire whether the amendment on page 69, beginning in line 19, has been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The record shows that amendment has been agreed to. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read by the Secretary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it strikes me that of all the extraordinary and unusual provisions in this extraordinary and unusual bill this is the most striking. It is another illustration that some Senators who are inexpressibly shocked at the word "subsidy" find reason for subsidizing the people of the country whenever it suits their purposes.

In the first place, Mr. President, if we are to go into the matter of live-stock development and live-stock production I should like to ask why we should confine it to certain specified States or to a particular section of the country? Why not give all of us a chance? We have a good deal of waste land in New England, and pastures that were once worth ten times what they are worth to-day, and some of us would like to engage in this profitable employment when the Government is back of it and an appropriation is provided to carry on the work.

The proposition as it came from the House was to appropriate $50,000 for this purpose. The Senate committee has increased that to $100,000, and the provision remains in the bill that this money shall be spent "in connection with the development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States."

Mr. President, every Republican Senator voted in favor of protecting the sugar industry in the State of Louisiana; every Republican Senator felt that the assault that was made on that great industry was unwarranted. But we were voted down, and the Democratic Senators in the majority have absolutely destroyed, as I understand, that great industry in that State, and, unfortunately, sugar is not any cheaper now, notwithstanding the destruction of that industry in Louisiana.

If this is a consolation prize for the damage that was done to that industry, I do not like the form which it assumes. Why should we appropriate $100,000 to enable a few States in the Union to engage in the production of live stock? What is the justification for it? If we are to take into consideration the fact that industries are injured or destroyed in a particular section of the country, let us go into the manufacturing districts of the United States at the present time and find what has happened there because of the same legislation that ruined this great industry in the State of Louisiana.

I recall the fact, Mr. President, that the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], who is always frank and open, two days ago said that "subsidy" grated harshly on the ears of Democrats. It does, Mr. President, when it touches the seaboard, but it is a sweet morsel under the tongue when it benefits other sections of the country.

Mr. President, I trust this appropriation will not be made, unless it is enlarged by striking out the words "in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of," so that it will be made for the United States. If it is to be made at all, I say let it be in the interest of all the people of all the States who desire to engage in this industry.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire, in all seriousness, if we have reached the time when it is necessary for the Government to go into the stock-breeding business?

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems so.

Mr. BRISTOW. Are there not enough intelligent and progressive farmers in the United States who are studying the development of live stock? That is the business of thousands of men in our country, and the progress that has been made along this line is marvelous. For the Government to establish farms and start breeding pens is something that I do not think the farming population is demanding just now; and does not the Senator from New Hampshire think that, with a deficit of some $37,000,000 now in the public revenues, we had better wait awhile until we see just where we are coming out?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would agree to that if we did not have any deficit; but we have a deficit, and the indications are that it is going to be larger in the near future.

I do not believe in this propaganda at all; but if we are going into it, then let us all have a fair deal and a fair chance to see if we can not use some of the abandoned farms of New Hampshire, of Massachusetts, of New York, and of Iowa to good advantage; turn them into stock ranches, and go to raising cattle and horses at the expense of the Government of the United States. So I say that at the proper time, if the amendment of the committee should be agreed to, I shall offer certain amendments, one of which will be to strike this paragraph entirely from the bill. I do not think it ought to be here; but if it is to be here, then it certainly ought to be modified so that we will not restrict this enterprise to 3 or 4 States out of the 48 States of the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, will he yield for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. It might in part serve to illumine the inquiry made by the Senator from New Hampshire to call attention to the hearing before the House Committee on Agriculture. The committee heard Dr. W. D. Hunter, who is in charge of the southern field-crop insect investigation of the Bureau of Entomology. On page 14 Mr. MCLAUGHLIN, a member of the committee, asked this question:

You will not need so much money as formerly for the sugar-cane pest, will you, because they are not going to raise sugar cane down there any longer?

Dr. Hunter replied:

On the contrary, there is every appearance that sugar cane will be produced on a considerable scale; and our view is that the investigation of sugar-cane insects becomes more important than ever it has been, because of the reduced profits that the planters will have.

That might serve as a motive for this paragraph.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would seem so. Mr. President, I have said all I care to say about the matter.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I am sorry to see a point made against this item by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire. Frankly, this item was placed in the bill to assist the sugar growers of Louisiana in engaging in a new industry. It is unnecessary to refer to the tariff law or its effects——

Mr. WORKS Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will yield as soon as I finish this sentence. It is unnecessary, I say, to refer to the tariff, and I am not going to do it, except to state that, as almost everyone knows, its effects upon the sugar industry of Louisiana have been very disastrous. People there who, with their ancestors, have been engaged in raising sugar for considerably over 100 years now find it necessary to engage in some new kind of agricultural pursuit. They can not plant cotton in the sugar section of Louisiana because of that other enemy which has been discussed here to-day to some extent, the boll weevil. It is utterly impossible to make a success of cotton in the sugar section of the State.

Those people have had but one idea in their agriculture for over a century They have been devoting their time and their attention to sugar, and raising a portion of the corn and hay needed to feed their work animals. Some few of them raise a very small number of hogs and cattle, but the one great business on which they depended was sugar cane. The crop sold annually for about $30,000,000. Now they can not continue to grow that crop. They must engage in another agricultural pursuit. They must be taught a different industry.

It is well enough to say that people know all about cattle raising and hog raising without being taught; but while it is true that farmers as a rule are very intelligent people, you can not destroy an industry in which men have been engaged all their lives and force them into a new industry all at once without training them as to how they should undertake it.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana, if his statement be true, why the beet growers of California were not included in this beneficial legislation. We have thousands of acres of land there that are devoted to beet growing. That industry undoubtedly will have to be given up, for the same reason suggested by the Senator from Louisiana. There are some $20,000,000 invested in that industry now in a manufacturing way, and that business is likely to be destroyed. I am not saying that this legislation ought to be adopted in favor of anyone; but certainly it ought to be just and equitable as to all persons affected in the same way, at least.

Mr. RANSDELL. In reply to the Senator I will say that no one is more in favor than I am of equitable and just legislation that will deal out its benefits fairly to all the people of the entire Nation. But there was no claim made before the Agricultural Committee about the necessity of extending this item to the beet-sugar section. If I am correctly informed, there are other agricultural industries in the beet-sugar section of the Union which are well known. Corn is a profitable crop in the beet section; also wheat and oats. It may be that those facts influenced the committee. I do not know but that it is true, also, that cattle and hog raising are quite profitable in the beet-sugar sections. I have understood that they raise magnificent cattle and hogs in Michigan. My information is that in most of the Western States where beet sugar is raised cattle and hogs and general animal industry are profitable, a very considerable portion of the time of the farmers being devoted to live stock; but that is not true in Louisiana.

I wish to say to the Senator from California, however, that if his section needs similar assistance from the National Congress he can get my vote for it. If his people are in the unfortunate condition that the Louisiana sugar growers are now in, he will not only get my vote for anything they need to help them start a new industry, but he will get my voice with as strong words as I can utter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. A gentleman from the State of Louisiana with whom I happened to engage in conversation recently said to me that the people were unduly alarmed; that the land there was just as well adapted to the raising of corn as the land in any other part of the country. Another gentleman who is engaged largely in farming in the State of Louisiana has stated in this city within two or three days that he raises corn in Louisiana successfully and to his entire satisfaction, and that the community where he lives is admirably adapted to the raising of hogs, a very profitable industry. Is the Senator sure that this land, which the United States Government has nurtured by protecting it from the ravages of the Mississippi River by the expenditure of millions of dollars, may not be profitably used for raising other crops?

Mr. RANSDELL. In answer to the question I will say very frankly that I hope and believe that the rich sugar lands in Louisiana may be made profitable in other lines of agriculture than sugar; but I firmly believe that the most hopeful business in which we can engage is animal industry, and I believe it is going to require a great deal of education of our people.

I am glad to hear the Senator speak of hog raising. I believe that is the best thing the people of Louisiana can engage in. I think there is more money in hogs in Louisiana than in sugar if they can go at it right; but you can not expect people who understand cane raising, sugar chemistry, sugar manufacturing, and so forth, to know how to handle hogs profitably, especially on the big plantations of thousands of acres, unless they go at it gradually and are properly taught.

We made an appropriation recently of half a million dollars for hog-cholera eradication. I am told that the great and rich State of Iowa lost over $33,000,000 last year from cholera in hogs. I firmly believe that the natural advantages of Louisiana for hog raising are superior, if anything, to those of Iowa; but we have a great many ignorant colored people in Louisiana on our farms who have not been taught hog raising. The owners of the lands are mostly whites, but they have not practiced hog raising as the people in Iowa have for a long, long time; and until they have been taught something about it they can not be expected to make a success of it.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator will permit me further, he spoke about there being very little injury, perhaps—or that was the substance of what the Senator said—to the Louisiana sugar industry. Let me read to you extracts from a telegram dated May 6, 1914, from Mr. Charles Godchaux, one of the most reliable men in the State of Louisiana and one of the largest bankers, to show you how our sugar interests have been affected there recently. It is addressed to Mr. Paul Christian, at the Woodward Building in this city, and the information was given at my request. The telegram reads as follows:

MAY 6, 1914.

PAUL CHRISTIAN,
Woodward Building, Washington, D. C.:

Miles Planting Co. abandoned their properties in Ascension and St. James Parishes, containing over 15,000 acres, fully equipped with three large factories and railroads. They have sold off their live stock and now offering factories at wrecking value. Part of lands leased for rice, corn, and other crops, but large portion idle and labor moved away. Loss to above company, composed of daughter and son, Gen. Miles, not less than half million. In Terrebonne Parish the Argyle property now under seizure will sell at fifty to seventy-five thousand, while owner three years ago purchased one-quarter interest from brother for 100,000. This shows loss of over 300,000. The Bayou Sale property of Mr. Wahl and others, consisting of about 2,000 acres, has been entirely abandoned, due to fact unable to secure money to operate. The seed cane saved to plant in January has not been touched, and loss on this place at least hundred thousand. Could cite dozens more abandoned places if desired. If Senator wants additional information or wishes me to come on will gladly do so. Wexler will be in Washington to-morrow and can possibly give additional information.

CHARLES GODCHAUX.

That gives some idea of the position in which those sugar planters are. I want to say that most of them are not complaining. They complained in advance of the passage of the tariff law, but they are not complaining now. They are going on and doing the best they can to meet these changed conditions, and they ask the help of the National Government to assist in meeting them. They want the National Government to establish a live-stock demonstration farm somewhere in the sugar section, and by actual, practical demonstration there in raising and feeding and handling hogs and cattle and sheep and horses and mules to give some idea as to how they should handle these animals profitably.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. RANSDELL. I must yield first to the Senator from New Hampshire, who rose some time ago.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply wish to get a little information.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted to furnish it if I can.

Mr. GALLINGER. The terms of this provision are:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned, or with individuals, to make such investigations and demonstrations as may be necessary in connection with the development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States—including the erection of such temporary farm buildings as may be found necessary, and for the employment of persons and means necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere.

Then the Senate committee adds—

And the appropriation is increased by $50.000.

Does the Senator contend that the Department of Agriculture can teach the intelligent people of any State in the American Union anything about raising live stock that is not known and that is not set before the people in the agricultural papers of the country and disseminated by farmers, one to another, in the country? Is there anything occult in this matter that requires deep, solemn investigation and development that is not now known?

That is the thought that occurred to me. What will this $100,000 be used for? I see they are going to erect some farm buildings at the expense of the Government. I suppose after they are erected they will belong to the farmers.

Mr. RANSDELL. In reply to the question, I will say that I do not think there is anything very occult about this matter; but I do think that when an industry never has been tried in a community it costs something to make the experiment. You can not tell whether or not, under the climatic conditions in Louisiana, you can make a success of raising, for instance, the Hereford cattle, the great beef breed. You can not tell that until you have tried it. Do you expect farmers, or planters, as we used to call them, who have lost their all—whose property, as I have just shown by Mr. Godchaux's telegram, has diminished in value in one instance from $400.000 three years ago to less than $100,000 now—to make experiments with Hereford cattle, or with the different breeds of hogs and horses and mules which may be adapted to that section?

The idea is to have the Government in a large way make experiments right in the heart of that sugar belt, and have the farmers in the entire sugar section visit the Government farm from time to time and see the results of the Government experiments; and it is also to convey to these farmers the information which other people have. We all know that the average farmer does not pay much attention to the live-stock papers, and that one good live demonstrator going from farm to farm and talking in person to the farmers, talking in person to their laborers, conveys a great deal more information and does a great deal more good than 500 Government publications or 500 agricultural papers. We want to convey the information directly to the people by word of mouth and by showing them what can be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish just to suggest on that point—I am old-fashioned enough and States'-rights man enough, and I sometimes think I am conspicuous in this body because of the views I hold on States' rights—I say I am old-fashioned enough and States' rights enough to believe that those matters should be given over to private enterprise absolutely, and that the Government has no business to engage in them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator from New Hampshire deny that the Government has destroyed the sugar industry of Louisiana?

Mr. GALLINGER. I affirmed that a moment ago, and it was destroyed in opposition to my voice and vote and the vote of the Senator from Michigan. That is true. Everything the Senator from Louisiana says is undoubtedly correct so far as the condition existing there is concerned; and during the pendency of that bill——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is not only correct, but deplorable.

Mr. GALLINGER. During the pendency of that bill it was a matter of profound regret to me that after the Republicans of the Senate had stood united in opposition to a provision that was calculated to destroy that industry the Senator from Louisiana did not help us to protect our own industries.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We protected his industry for many years.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that private enterprise will do this work, and I hope the Government will not get into it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I can quite well understand the anxiety of the Senator's party, having destroyed the cane-sugar industry in the State of Louisiana, to at least partially remedy that injury. But I notice this appropriation applies not only to the cane-sugar industry, which has been ruined, but to the cotton districts of the United States as well, and I did not understand that we had passed any legislation that was calculated to injure them. Why do we include the cotton districts as well as the sugar-cane districts?

Mr. RANSDELL. To answer the question I will say I do not know why the word "cotton" was used there. I can tell you, if I understand it correctly, this money will not be used in cotton sections. It will be used in the cane sections, although I may say that there is a borderland, a mutual ground in Louisiana, between cotton and cane, and in that way this demonstration work would be helpful in a way to that portion of the cotton land where the boll weevil has now driven the industry out.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Louisiana, of course, understands that his party has not adopted any legislation which will tend to injure the cotton districts, but the legislation has been directed entirely toward the ruin of the cane-sugar districts.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Utah——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. RANSDELL. I think cotton is on the free list, just as sugar is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is a relationship between cotton and sugar.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator understand that any legislation has been passed which has injured the cotton districts?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know that any legislation has been passed intending to injure any section of the United States. I certainly do not think that they have tried to injure cotton, and I do not know that they have tried to injure sugar, but they certainly have injured it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They did not take any extreme measures to prevent the injury of the cane-sugar industry, at any rate.

Mr. RANSDELL. They certainly did not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They gave it slow poison.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am still without any information from the Senator as to why we provide for expending a part of this appropriation in the cotton districts.

Mr. RANSDELL. The only answer I can give, as I stated before, is that in the State of Louisiana, in the Atchafalaya River Basin and along the Mississippi River, where the vegetation is very rich and there is a great deal of moisture, there are certain lands which, before the advent of the boll weevil, would make pretty good cotton, and a little farther south they were entirely devoted to sugar. Now, when the boll weevil came in and drove the cotton farmers out, sugar planters moved northward and planted in sugar cane the lands that had once been in cotton. When the recent tariff bill was enacted they found that they could not make cane profitably there any more. They had been driven out of the cotton business in that section, and they could not grow cotton profitably. So they were between the devil and the deep blue sea, and they are appealing to the National Government now to help them raise animals of some kind there. That is the only reason I can explain why the word "cotton" was used along with "sugar."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wonder if the Senator from Louisiana would be willing to strike out the words "cotton districts" and insert the words "sugar districts of the United States" in place?

Mr. RANSDELL. I believe that would destroy the purpose of the bill. I am perfectly willing to strike out the word "cotton." if the Senator insists on it, and insert "sugar cane," and if you do that——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me finish my answer, please. If the Senators from the beet-sugar sections state that they need a similar appropriation to help them tide over the change from one industry to another, as stated by the Senator from California, I will vote for it and talk for it; but no effort of that kind was made before the Agricultural Committee. If there had been, I am sure we would have given them a reasonable appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator from Utah permit me to make an observation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We are not quite as hopeless in the beet-sugar section as are our friends in the Louisiana cane districts. Since this crime was perpetrated by our friends upon the other side of the Chamber there has been a distinct revulsion of public sentiment in the beet-sugar States. The unanimity existing among all the opponents of the Democratic Party is so great that we confidently expect to survive this serious blow, defeat the free-trade party, and come out with a revived American sugar industry.

I have no doubt whatever that the folly committed by our opponents under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky who sits near me [Mr. JAMES] will soon be corrected, and that out of their defeat will come with new strength an independent, profitable American sugar industry. We have suffered in Michigan as have the sugar growers of Louisiana.

Mr. JAMES. Has sugar increased in price 1 cent, as the Senator prophecied it would when put on the free list?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Almost every article upon which the tariff was reduced has increased in price rather than diminished, but the volume of production has decreased.

Mr. JAMES. Except sugar, which has gone down in price.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The present price of sugar is perhaps being maintained just below the normal level on the world's market for the purpose of satisfying such extreme advocates as my distinguished friend from Kentucky that his labors were not wholly in vain. But when the sugar fields of Louisiana are turned over to stock raisers and the beet fields of the Northern States are turned over to cereals, the price of sugar will go back just where it was before free trade was begun; it will be controlled by practically one interest, and that interest has never been so vitally interested in the welfare of the American people as to reduce the price of its product voluntarily.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator has gone astray from his former prophecies made in the debate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator said then if we put sugar on the free list the price would not go down.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. JAMES. Now, it has been placed on the free list and the price has gone down.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator tells us that it is because of some sort of legerdemain that is being performed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Legislative legerdemain, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. JAMES. The consumers like that sort of a thing, and if we get a few more things on the free list the prices will be reduced.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Sugar is not yet on the free list.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Kentucky may lay that flattering unction to his soul, if he desires, but the unblushing truth is that when his party destroyed the American sugar industry they put into the hands of the big refining companies, who are refining the raw sugar of Cuba, a weapon with which to exact from the American consumer practically their own price for sugar. Under Republican rule one-half of the sugar consumed in America was produced from our own fields in competition with the refiners.

Mr. JAMES. Will the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And that fact resulted in holding the price of sugar at a lower figure than was ever before enjoyed by the people of our country.

Mr. JAMES. As the Senator is telling us about the disaster that has befallen those engaged in producing sugar by reason of the reduction in the price of sugar, will he be kind enough to give us some sort of an estimate as to the benefit that has been bestowed upon the consumers of sugar by the reduction in price, so that we may level it up and see who has been benefited most and who has been injured most?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will leave that to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. It is true, the Senator will not deny, that sugar to-day is cheaper than it has been since 1894.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Possibly, but the people have less money to buy it to-day than they have had in the last 20 years.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yielded to Senators for a question, and I hope they will permit me to proceed and finish the remarks I was making. Before concluding I wish to read a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture in regard to this proposition. It is a very intelligent letter, and I hope Senators will pay close attention while I read it. It is dated the 27th of April and is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, April 27, 1914.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR RANSDELL: With regard to the need for investigations and demonstrations in connection with the development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts, as approved by the Senate committee and incorporated in the bill now before the Senate, I would say that the department has for some years been impressed with the need for a redirection of the agriculture of those sections where, for various reasons, single crops, such as sugar cane and to a certain extent cotton, in the deltas of the rivers flowing into the Gulf of Mexico, have been the main dependence of the farmers.

The cane-sugar industry in the United States has been continuously subject to very great fluctuations of yield and return. This has been due to various causes, particularly to the fact that it involves the production of a staple crop, which is very sensitive to low temperatures, in regions where the growing season is frequently too short for profitable production, in competition with tropical regions not subject to this handicap.

The soils best suited to cane production are unfortunately in many cases subject to destructive overflow under the conditions that exist, and consequently sugar cane is not infrequently menaced or actually damaged by overflow in the early portion of the season and by untimely frosts which damage the cane before the crop can be worked up at the end of the season. Since the advent of the cotton-boll weevil the same causes have operated to reduce very greatly the regularity of production, and therefore to increase the risk of the cotton growers in the fertile delta lands, the control of the boll weevil having been found decidedly more difficult and uncertain in such districts than in most of the cotton territory.

Study of the situation by the department and the experiment stations indicates that the most promising direction for agriculture to take in these sections is through the development of a better-balanced and more self-maintaining agriculture than now exists, which necessarily includes live-stock production. Unfortunately the long dependence of the farmers upon sugar and cotton has prevented the accumulation of practical experience with live stock, with the result that comparatively little is as yet known regarding the methods which will be necessary to adopt in developing a live-stock industry in those sections. Some experimentation has been made by the State experiment stations, but there is very great need at the present time of comprehensive experiments and demonstrations along this line in these sections. The situation is acute, and to be of greatest value to the farmers the work should be promptly inaugurated and vigorously prosecuted upon a scale sufficiently large to insure the accomplishment of effective results.

The situation as it exists is very unusual in that it is necessary for a large number of farmers who have through two or three generations practiced a single-crop agriculture to very suddenly and radically change their whole industry—a condition which has but rarely occurred in the history of American agriculture and which appears to require rather unusual governmental consideration.

Yours, very truly,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Now, Mr. President and Senators, I do not wish to take more time of the Senate. I appeal to you, to every one of you, to vote for this appropriation. I earnestly believe it is going to be helpful to the people who certainly need help. I am not in the position of a mendicant in this appeal. I am making it because I believe it is simple justice that I ask for my people. They have been put in this unfortunate position because of legislation which has been adopted by a majority of Congress. It is not their fault that they are in this position, but certainly since they are in it we ought to do what we can to help them. If an industry which paid to the sugar growers of Louisiana $30,000,000 a year can possibly be restored, or, rather, if something can be established in place thereof at an expenditure of $100,000, it is surely a good business proposition to do it. If we can raise a large quantity of beeves and hogs and other food products on those sugar lands in Louisiana it may help to solve to some extent the high cost of living.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I admire the earnest enthusiasm of my friend from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], but it does seem a little stretching the limit. There is not a man in Louisiana, I believe, but who is intelligent enough, capable enough, living in an agricultural community, to know as much now about increasing his herd or his drove of hogs as he would know after a demonstration had been gone into at the hands of the Agricultural Department.

I say this is burdening a thing almost to the breaking point, and I urge my friend from Louisiana in all reason just to let up on this part of agricultural demonstration work. Nature will attend to that. You supply the embryo of the herd or drove and it will fill your land with hoofs and plenty, and happier days will come to you.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am very much surprised to see a provision of this kind in an appropriation bill. It is paternalism run mad, and I do not believe that if the appropriation were made that it would do very much good to the people of Louisiana.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] knows that my heart goes out in sympathy to his people. He knows what I predicted on the floor of the Senate would happen if the proposed legislation was passed. I say to him now that I would rather vote a straight-out appropriation of a million dollars and have it distinctly understood what the appropriation was for than to vote for a provision of this kind.

I want to say also to the Senator that if his people should undertake to raise horses or cattle according to the plan that will be shown to them by the representatives of the Agricultural Department in buying blooded stock and spending money upon the keep of it as nobody but a millionaire could do, they would go bankrupt even if they had the money with which to begin. Therefore it does seem to me that this is the wrong way for Congress to proceed to help the unfortunate people of Louisiana.

Mr. President, I feel constrained at this time to offer a point of order against this amendment. In doing so I will call attention to Rule XVI, paragraph 2. In the first place all admit that it is general legislation upon an appropriation bill. Paragraph 2 of Rule XVI provides:

2. All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are considered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

I do not think that the amendment was ever offered in the Senate.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, it was offered in the Senate. I introduced it myself.

Mr. SMOOT. In the shape in which it was reported in this bill?

Mr. RANSDELL. I introduced an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation by $50,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Ah, yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Some of the wording was changed, but the amount was the same and the principle was the same.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not denying the fact that the Senator from Louisiana introduced an amendment increasing this amount, but the whole wording of this amendment has been added. It comes from the Appropriations Committee, I will admit.

Again, I call attention to paragraph 3 of Rule XVI.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Just as soon as I get through with this matter, I will gladly yield to the Senator.

Paragraph 3 of Rule XVI provides:

3. No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto.

Mr. President, there is not any Senator who does not know that this is general legislation upon an appropriation bill; there is not anyone here who does not know that it was never estimated for. Not only that, but it was never offered here and referred to the committee by way of amendment. I make the point of order against the amendment on those grounds.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I wish to say that I do not happen to have the printed report of the hearings held in the other House in regard to this matter before me, but I am inclined to believe that the item was estimated for; that is, the $50,000 item. Of course the increase was not estimated for; but the provision as it came from the other House was estimated for.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that what I am making the point of order on is the amendment which is here. The point of order can not be made as to whether we shall appropriate the $50,000 provided for in this bill as it came from the other House. The only way that can be reached is by a vote of the Senate; and when the proper time comes, if no other Senator offers such an amendment, I shall offer an amendment to strike that out.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I understand the Senator's point of order is made on the amendment as reported by the Senate committee?

Mr. SMOOT. Entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not understand the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. RANSDELL. To strike out the whole of the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah makes the point of order that the amendment offered by the committee is legislation; that it was not presented in the form of an amendment; that it is not germane, and is out of order for various other reasons. Without reciting those other reasons, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish the Chair would hear me on that for a moment. I certainly hope a matter so important as this is to my State is not going to be thus disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is not debatable; but the Senator from Louisiana can appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. A point of order does not lie against the House part of the provision. That can not be put out of the bill on a point of order.

Mr. RANSDELL. I understood that the addition of $50,000, which is necessary and without which we can not get any material benefit, would go ont under the point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. That was the point of order that I made as against the amendment.

Mr. RANSDELL. Against the additional $50,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; against the whole amendment.

Mr. WARREN. That leaves $50,000 standing yet in limbo. The House put in $50,000, which we have stricken out. That does not come under the point of order.

Mr. RANSDELL. I understand that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move to strike out the entire appropriation as it stands in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent agreement under which the Senate is operating was to first consider only committee amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I withhold my amendment until the bill comes into the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the next committee amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next committee amendment passed over is, on page 71, after line 14, where the committee propose to insert the following:

The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to prepare a plan for reorganizing, redirecting, and systematizing the work of the Department of Agriculture as the interests of economical and efficient administration may require; such plan shall be submitted to Congress in the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1916; and the estimates of expenses of the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1916 shall be prepared and submitted in accordance therewith.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator having charge of the bill, before passing over the question, to explain in just as few words as possible the real object of this amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah will remember that several years ago we made an appropriation creating a Board of Efficiency and Economy. That board has submitted numerous and voluminous reports suggesting ways and means for the reorganization of various departments, coordinating the work, and eliminating duplication of services. The present Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Houston, is an experienced executive officer, having been president of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, having been connected with the University of Texas, and having been president of Washington University, in the State of Missouri. It is his desire to reorganize the work. I have here a letter from the Secretary upon the subject.

Several of the bureaus are to some extent performing the same service now. That results in an increased and unnecessary expense. It is the desire of the Secretary of Agriculture to be authorized—probably he has the power as it is, but he desires special authorization of Congress—to proceed to prepare plans for the reorganization of the department in the interest of economy and efficiency. The plans are to be submitted to Congress at its next session for the further action of Congress. I think this is a most important amendment, and I trust it will be allowed to remain in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that I have been rather in sympathy with the work that has been done in the past by the commission spoken of by the Senator, although I understood that there was not going to be an appropriation to continue that commission for the coming year.

Mr. GORE. I think not; no, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator if the work of that commission is completed so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am really not able to answer that inquiry.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I will not object to the amendment, but I really would like to have the information for which I asked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 71, after line 23, it is proposed to insert:

Hereafter employees of the Department of Agriculture assigned to permanent duty in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Guam may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, without additional expense to the Government, be granted leave of absence not to exceed 30 days in any one year, which leave may, in exceptional or meritorious cases where an employee is ill, be extended, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, not to exceed 30 days additional in any one year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if this is a cumulative leave of absence?

Mr. GORE. It is a cumulative leave of absence. At present employees in the Philippines can not come and go in the 30 days allowed under the law, but during three years they can accumulate 90 days, which would afford them an opportunity to return to this country, to have some vacation, and then to return to their posts of duty.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not remember the provisions of the original law, but no doubt the Senator has examined that law and can answer the question I am about to ask. This provision does not increase the leave of absence, taking the three years together, does it?

Mr. GORE. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. SMOOT. It simply provides that they shall have the same leave of absence as the employees of the Agricultural Department in continental United States?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir. Under the present law they really have no leave of absence, because they can not come and go in the 30 days allowed.

Mr. SMOOT. They have it under the law, whether they can use it or not.

Mr. GORE. They can under the circumstances have practically no vacation.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the wording of the provision. I am afraid it does not cover the point exactly as he wishes it to be covered. What we ought to do is to allow 30 days' leave of absence in a year, and to allow an accumulation for not exceeding, say, three or four years; but the amendment provides for an additional 30 days, without making it cumulative, except as to one year, which would have the effect of granting 60 days' leave in one year.

Mr. SMOOT. That is why I asked the Senator from Oklahoma if it was intended to be cumulative, because it does seem to me, under the wording of this amendment, that not only will the employees of the Agricultural Department in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Guam be given 30 days, but 60 days each year.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the amendment has no such intention as that, and if it is subject to that construction, of course it ought to be corrected. I will say that the amendment was prepared by the officers of the department and was explained to me as having that intention solely in view. Of course, I would be glad to have it made more definite.

Mr. WARREN. It ought to be arranged as it is in the Army.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to the exact wording of the amendment to see if he does not agree with the construction that has been placed upon the provision. It reads that the employees referred to shall—be granted leave of absence not to exceed 30 days in any one year—

That is the present law—which leave may, in exceptional or meritorious cases where an employee is ill, be extended, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture—not to exceed 30 days additional in any one year.

Or, in other words, in those meritorious cases the Secretary of Agriculture can give 60 days' leave in one year.

Mr. GORE. I believe the proper construction would be that it would be cumulative for two years, and not further than that. It could not be extended for three years so as to grant 90 days' leave in any one year.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not believe it could be extended two years under the wording. I believe it would allow 60 days' leave in one year.

Mr. GORE. There is no reason why it should not be placed beyond a doubt, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator allow this to go over to-night so as to ascertain if we can not word the provision in such a way that there will be no objection to it?

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he has any expectation of completing the committee amendments to-night?

Mr. GORE. I rather doubt our ability to entirely complete them, although there are only three or four more remaining. I suggest to the Senator that if he will allow us to proceed for a few more minutes, if any amendment really leads to discussion, I will not insist upon it.

Mr. STONE. I intended to move, as soon as it was agreeable, an executive session.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is 20 minutes of 6 o'clock now. I suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that he let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. STONE. I will not make the motion just now.

Mr. GORE. If the Senator will allow me a few more minutes, if any of the remaining amendments result in debate I shall not insist on proceeding to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 72, after line 7, it is proposed to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to better carry into effect the provisions of the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stats., p. 961), entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," the moneys appropriated therein shall be available for the employment of agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required for the purpose of said act in the city of Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment passed over was, on page 72, after line 18, to insert:

The Secretary of Agriculture may hereafter exchange general scientific apparatus and laboratory equipment purchased from any lump-fund appropriation of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is a very peculiar provision, and I want to ask the Senator what it is intended for, because it seems to me that it might open—I do not say that it would do so—the door to a great deal of fraud?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that under existing law the department is allowed to exchange old typewriters and some other machines and appliances for new apparatus. That has resulted in considerable economy, so the department advises me, and they say that the same treatment——

Mr. OVERMAN. Why do you say in the amendment "purchased from any lump-fund appropriation"?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I object to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why are those words used?

Mr. GORE. There are several lump-sum appropriations carried in this bill, and I assume that some of the machinery and apparatus to be affected by this provision may have been purchased under a lump-sum appropriation, and in order to cover them the expression was used. I would say "lump-sum appropriation or otherwise." I see no use in limiting the provision.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why limit it by retaining the "lump-fund" provision at all? Why not strike out those words and let the department exchange scientific apparatus when they want to do so?

Mr. GORE. I think that would be better.

Mr. SMOOT. The provision is now limited by the words "purchased from any lump-fund appropriation of the Department of Agriculture," and it seems to me that the only danger lies in that limitation, because when apparatus and appliances are specifically provided for the Committee on Appropriations know how many are purchased and the amount paid for them; but as to those purchased from a lump-sum appropriation we never know.

Mr. GORE. There is a bare possibility that they may now have the privilege of exchange with reference to such appliances as are purchased otherwise than from lump-sum appropriations; but upon that I am not advised. It seems to me to be better not to restrict it to appliances purchased from lump-sum or lump-fund appropriaions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator offer an amendment?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; I suggest that as an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state the amendment for the benefit of the Secretary?

Mr. OVERMAN. Strike out the words "lump fund."

Mr. GORE. I suggest that we omit the words "lump fund."

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether the Senator intended that the provision should read "lump sum" or "lump fund." The bill reads "lump fund," but I suppose by that is meant a lump-sum appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment reported by the committee, on page 72, line 21, it is proposed to strike out the words "lump fund."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the committee as amended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I thought I would utter a few words upon the merits of the proposition itself; but as the Chair has taken the vote, and has declared it passed, I shall not do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the amendment as amended is not yet agreed to. [After a pause.] The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. It is also proposed to insert the following after the amendment just agreed to:

And hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make studies of cooperation among farmers in matters of rural credits and sanitation and of other forms of cooperation in rural communities; to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information growing out of these studies, in order to provide a basis for broader utilization of results secured by the research, experimental, and demonstration work of the Department of Agriculture, agricultural colleges, and State experiment stations; and to employ such persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere as the Secretary may consider necessary, $50,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Is this for the purpose of establishing another bureau here in the department?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think it will not be necessary to have another distinctive bureau established. The services contemplated under this provision possibly would be devolved on several different bureaus, pursuing different lines of investigation and inquiry.

Mr. SMOOT. Was this item estimated for?

Mr. GORE. I am not certain whether it was contained in the original Book of Estimates or not. It was subsequently recommended by the department in a supplemental communication.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not care for a recommendation. I want to know whether it was really estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury in his Book of Estimates.

Mr. GORE. I will ascertain in a moment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is general legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I ask that the amendment go over. I will look it up in the meantime.

Mr. WARREN. If the chairman of the committee will permit me, I have before me the language of the law which provides for these additional leaves of absence; and I should like to offer an amendment to the provision on page 72.

Mr. SMOOT. Did the Senator from Oklahoma allow the last amendment that we had under consideration to go over?

Mr. GORE. Yes; I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to revert to the amendment on page 72.

Mr. OVERMAN. We can take that up to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. We have not finished this yet. It will take only a moment.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. OVERMAN. We can not finish the bill to-night. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 15, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 14, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinitely wise, all-powerful, and ever-loving God, "Thy throne is established of old; Thou art from everlasting." Thou alone knowest the beginning and the end. "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." Help us to realize, O God, that if our work lives and bears fruit, it must be in accordance with the eternal laws which Thou hast established. Inspire us, therefore, that we may ever be actuated by the highest and purest motives, and thus by the rectitude of our behavior receive at last Thy benediction. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DANIEL ALOYSIUS HAGGERTY.

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what he desires to speak on?

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. I desire to speak on the life of Corpl. Daniel Aloysius Haggerty, whose funeral is held at Cambridge to-day. He was killed at Vera Cruz.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to object to a request of that kind under these peculiar circumstances, but I think we have reached the point in the session where we can not afford to have speeches by unanimous consent coming in front of the public business. But under the peculiar circumstances of this case I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. What is the time, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on the 22d day of April last my colleague, Mr. DEITRICK, called the attention of the House to the death at Vera Cruz, Mexico, of Daniel Aloysius Haggerty, a resident of Cambridge, Mass. While I can not add to the tribute paid him by my colleague, I desire to state that although Daniel Haggerty was a citizen of Cambridge he was born in the town of Brookfield, in the district which I have the honor to represent—a district that has had a great record for patriotism from the earliest days of the Republic.

Comparatively rare, permit me to say, are the localities around which cluster such varied historic interests, centered in which are so many historic relationships, and springing from which are so many historic influences, as belong to the territory in which young Haggerty first saw the light of day.

The hills and valleys of the beautiful Brookfields have their association with events deservedly memorable, and no doubt the historic events that occurred in this locality had a great influence on the mind of the growing young Irish-American.

In Brookfield in 1660, in the midst of the heart of the forest, surrounded by savages, the pioneers set up a hamlet. They were also the pioneers in humanity's greatest achievement—the founding of the American Republic.

It is fair to assume that young Daniel Haggerty inherited from his environment a little of the love of freedom and the patriotism of the early settlers of the Brookfields.

Fifteen years after the settlement of the town the daring Philip, the ambitious son of the dead Massasoit, resolved to strike for self-preservation, and then began the massacre at Brookfield, known as King Philip's War, with its awful siege, when 82 survivors of the original massacre suffered four days and nights of absolutely incessant attack and defense, with bullets and arrows piercing the walls of the extemporized fort. Every home was destroyed, the fields laid waste, and the horses and cattle killed or driven away.

I stood upon this historic spot a short time ago, where are marked by monuments or tablets the occurrences of those days, occurrences which were made familiar to young Haggerty as he roamed the fields and forests of his native town in his boyhood days.

When the news reached Brookfield, on the afternoon of April 19, 1775, of the Battle of Concord and Lexington, three companies of Brookfield men set forth that very night, and in the Battle of Bunker Hill many of these men fought.

Is it any wonder that Daniel Haggerty was a patriot when you recall that at a town meeting held in his native town on May 22, 1776, it was voted that—this town will support the honorable Congress in the measure if they, for our liberty, shall see fit to declare the Colonies independent of Great Britain—

thus anticipating the immortal Declaration of Independence of July 4, 1776, by full 43 days.

The courage of Brookfield's sons was demonstrated, and the blood of Brookfield men shed, on nearly all the fields which marked the long and bloody duel between France and England for the control of the continent.

And when, in 1861, the call to arms rang through the North the Brookfields sent forth some 650 men, not merely the quota that was called for, but some 49 in addition. It is a matter of history that from the beginning of the township to the death of Daniel Haggerty, at Vera Cruz, on the 21st day of last month, Brookfield has fulfilled to the utmost her patriotic obligations to the country, and to-day, throughout the limits of a settlement so ancient, so historic, so worthy, there is a fresh civic pride because of the added luster he has brought to the heritage of the Brookfields.

From the Navy Department I learn that Private Haggerty was born April 4, 1878, and first enlisted July 24, 1906, at Boston, Mass. He served at Boston, New York, Puget Sound, Wash., on board the U. S. S. Philadelphia, and 34 months on board the U. S. S. Colorado. He was honorably discharged July 23, 1910, with character "excellent," by reason of the expiration of his enlistment, but he reenlisted January 7, 1911, at Boston, Mass., and served at Boston, Port Royal, S. C., Philadelphia, Camp Elliott, Isthmian Canal Zone, and was ashore in Nicaragua from September 4, 1912, to January 10, 1913, participating in the capture of Masaya on October 3 and 4, 1914. He was killed in action at Vera Cruz, Mexico, at 1 o'clock on the afternoon of April 21 last, while attached to the Eighth Company, Second Regiment of Marines.

Corpl. Haggerty, who was called "Dinny" by those who knew him best, was the type of American we all admired. Soldierly in bearing, manly in appearance, and courteous in demeanor, commanding the respect of all with whom he was acquainted. Throughout his extended period of service he never shirked his duties, going about them in a manner which marked him a born soldier. In short, he was courageous, frank, sympathetic, of a helpful nature, and a hater of sham and hypocrisy.

Mr. Speaker, the sons of Massachusetts, from its earliest days to the present time, have always responded to the calls of the country, and now the name of Daniel Haggerty is added to the long list of the pride and hope of uncounted households who, departing to serve their country, return no more, but whose names are enrolled in the hearts and memories of a grateful people. [Applause.]

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES.

Mr. RUCKER, Mr. BARNHART, and Mr. FLOOD of Virginia rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] was up first.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I call up privileged House resolution 256.

The SPEAKER. Is it privileged?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes, sir; it is privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution, as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 256) providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate and report whether any Members have been guilty of violating the provisions of the Criminal Code by soliciting contributions for political purposes, etc.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. This is a resolution for the appointment of a special committee to make an investigation which was referred to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], the chairman of that committee, has made report, No. 655, stating in the report that—

The Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, to which was referred, by order of the House, the resolution (H. Res. 256) entitled "Resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate and report whether any Members have been guilty of violating the provisions of the Criminal Code by soliciting contributions for political purposes, etc.," having had the same under consideration, respectfully submits to the House the facts ascertained and its conclusions thereon—apparently making no report on the resolution; not a favorable report, or an adverse report, or even reporting the resolution back to the House. At the end of the report there is included a recommendation for the passage of two resolutions which have not been printed, at least in bill form.

Now the question is, If this resolution is taken up for consideration, what will be before the House?

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] say?

Mr. RUCKER. I say that the resolutions reported by the committee will be before the House as a substitute for the resolution which was referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Have those resolutions been printed?

Mr. RUCKER. I can not say that either of them has been printed in bill form, but they are printed in the report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is the resolution which the gentleman seeks to consider on the calendar?

Mr. MANN. They are not on the calendar.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that manifestly settles the proposition. The House can not consider a resolution that is not on the calendar. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, manifest that the only resolutions or bills which the House can consider are those that are on its calendar, except by unanimous consent or under a suspension of the rules, because all bills or resolutions when reported to the House for consideration must go on the calendar. If these resolutions are not on the calendar, there is nothing before the House to act upon, except by unanimous consent or on a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MANN. House resolution 256 is, I believe, on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is the original Mann resolution? That is on the calendar?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that would be in order for consideration as a matter of privilege under these circumstances.

Mr. MANN. The question is whether it is properly on the calendar. It is not reported back. I have no objection to the consideration of the proposition in some shape, but I would like to know what is to be considered.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, the resolution reported to the House by the committee is plainly a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, which is on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The report says:

Your committee is firmly of opinion that congressional committees or members thereof may lawfully solicit and receive contributions for political purposes from Senators and Representatives in Congress; that such solicitation or receipt of contributions from Senators or Representatives may be lawfully made and had in offices assigned Senators and Representatives, and therefore recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is no violation of section 118 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit or receive assessments or contributions for political purposes from other Senators or Members of the House.

"Resolved, That it is no violation of section 119 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit contributions for political purposes from other Senators or Members of the House by letters written in his office in the Senate or House Office Building."

Mr. MANN. Those resolutions are not on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. No; those are not on the calendar.

Mr. RUCKER. They are a substitute for what is on the calendar.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have not a copy of the resolution in my hand; but did the original resolution provide for the appointment of a committee to investigate certain questions?

Mr. RUCKER. The committee was directed to make an investigation.

The SPEAKER. It did; and on motion of Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, the House itself referred the Mann resolution to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What was the original substance of the Mann resolution—to create a committee to investigate, or was it to make an investigation?

Mr. MANN. It was to create a committee to investigate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If that be the case, then let me ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] whether or not it was not the duty of his committee, it being referred to that committee, to report, not upon the merits but upon the question of whether there should be a committee to investigate?

Mr. RUCKER. I thought that was the question submitted to the committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Illinois has just stated that the substantial part of his resolution was that part which directed the creation of a committee to investigate.

Mr. MANN. That is all there was in my resolution.

Mr. RUCKER. To investigate certain specific matters. That was the gist of it.

The SPEAKER. Evidently the House itself did not regard the last resolve, that a committee of seven Members be appointed by the Speaker to investigate and report to this House, and so forth, as being a part of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. That is the only resolve there was.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. I beg the Speaker's pardon, but that was the only resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, what was the form of the resolution under which it was referred to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] simply rose in his place and moved that the whole thing be referred to the Committee on Election of President and Vice President. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] presented his resolution as privileged, which it was, and then the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] made his motion, and the House disposed of it in that way. That is the history of the transaction.

Mr. MANN. I think the Speaker probably just now looked on page 2 of the printed resolution and found the word "resolved." That is a quotation of a resolution adopted by the Democratic national congressional committee, and is not a part of my resolution but is a part of the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement is correct.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, if the substance of his resolution was merely to create a committee to investigate, it is doubtful whether it was privileged or not.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is too late to raise that point.

The SPEAKER. To raise what point?

Mr. MANN. Whether that resolution was privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt that it was.

Mr. MANN. It is too late to question now whether it was privileged or not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I submit that, while of course it is too late now to raise any question as to the original resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], as to whether it is privileged, yet this is presented now as a privileged proposition. If the original resolution presented by the gentleman from Illinois was not privileged, although the point was not made, it might affect the question of the privilege of the resolution now presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. I do not think there can be any question about the resolution being privileged. I do not think anybody will raise that question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recall whether it was raised originally or not; but even if it was not, if it was raised now the Chair would rule that the Mann resolution was privileged. If it is not a privileged matter to find out whether Members of Congress were committing felonies or misdemeanors, I can not conceive of anything that could be privileged.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the Speaker will pardon me, that is probably true; but it depends on the way in which you go about it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has stated that the germ of his resolution—the fundamental phase of it—was to create a committee to make the investigation. I submit that a resolution simply to create a committee is not necessarily privileged.

The SPEAKER. Now, the truth about this whole business is that this entire report by the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and so forth, might be considered as surplusage, except the resolution which they bring back here in the nature but not in the form of a substitute for the Mann resolution. When you come down to the gist of the matter, that is what it is; and if the Mann resolution was privileged originally, then this resolution is privileged.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order at this time to ask for an agreement for debate?

Mr. MANN. We have not got to that point yet.

The SPEAKER. No. The way to dispose of the Mann resolution, in the condition into which it has gotten, if anybody wants to do it, is for the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and so forth, to report the Mann resolution back with the recommendation that it lie on the table, and then put this resolution in as a substitute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that that is the proper method. If my resolution was laid on the table, there would not be anything left before the House. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the proper way to do would be to report my resolution back or to report their resolution back in lieu of it.

The SPEAKER. That is what the committee practically do on the last page of the report.

Mr. MANN. They do not say anything about it.

Mr. RUCKER. We do not use the words "in lieu," but we tried to make this resolution in lieu of yours, and I believe it is in lieu.

Mr. MANN. What I asked was, What would be before the House?

Mr. RUCKER. I think the matter before the House will be the adoption of the resolution submitted by the committee in lieu of the Mann resolution.

Mr. MANN. Would it be as an amendment to the Mann resolution?

Mr. RUCKER. No; it is a substitution for it.

Mr. MANN. The only resolution on the calendar is the Mann resolution. Is this a substitute for that?

Mr. RUCKER. It is substituted for the Mann resolution.

Mr. MANN. Which one is to be voted on? That is what my parliamentary inquiry is.

Mr. RUCKER. So far as I am concerned, I do not care which one is voted on first. I want a vote on the one the committee reported.

Mr. MANN. It is highly desirable to know before we start in, if we can.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I notice that the original resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois reads as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of seven members shall be appointed by the Speaker to investigate and report to this House whether any Members of this House have been guilty of violating any of the provisions of the Criminal Code by soliciting or receiving or by being in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States, and particularly from Members of this House—

And so forth.

That is a demand for an investigation and a finding of facts. Now, it is clear that the resolution reported by the committee, of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is chairman, fails to cover what is contemplated in the original resolution. The committee resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That it is no violation of section 118 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit or receive assessments or contributions for political purposes from other Senators or Members of the House.

Resolved, That it is no violation of section 119 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit contributions for political purposes, from other Senators or Members of the House, by letters written in his office in the Senate or House Office Building.

In this resolution there is no finding of facts, but only a statement that a Senator or a Representative may solicit or receive political contributions from other Senators or Representatives without violating the Criminal Code. And, too, is confined entirely to contributions "from Senators or Members," whereas the original resolution refers also to contributions—from any person——

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, no.

Mr. COOPER. The original resolution suggested an inquiry to ascertain whether any Member of the House was guilty of soliciting a contribution from "any person," in violation of law, and "particularly from any Member of the Senate or House."

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman read the rest of that resolution?

Mr. RUCKER. He does not read it all.

Mr. COOPER. It says:

And particularly from any Member of the Senate or House.

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; the line before that:

Contribution to any political purpose whatever from any person receiving a salary or compensation derived from any moneys of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. COOPER. The committee resolution does not say whether any Senator or Member of the House is guilty or not guilty of unlawfully soliciting or receiving contributions from any person.

The SPEAKER. It does not say "any person"; it says, "any other person drawing a salary."

Mr. COOPER. That is the language of the law and of the resolution, and, of course, is what I meant. Senators and Representatives draw salaries from the United States Treasury, and there are other persons who also draw salaries from the Treasury. The committee resolution declares that it is not a violation of law for a Senator or Representative to solicit contributions from other Senators or Representatives, but it makes no report of an investigation nor findings of fact showing whether any Representative has in vioaltion of law solicited contributions from "any person" drawing a salary from the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule on this matter. The substance has nothing to do with it; it is the form. The report of the committee does not recommend anything to be done with the Mann resolution, and it does not suggest any substitute for the Mann resolution. In substance it is a substitute. So the Chair thinks the Committee on Election of President and Vice President will have to remodel its report.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I concede what I presume it is necessary to concede, that the report may be subject to criticism from a technical standpoint, but in view of the fact that this is a very important matter, affecting every Member, I ask unanimous consent that the report may be considered as amended so as to report back the Mann resolution (H. Res. 256) and the committee resolutions as a substitute therefor.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I have no objection to considering the resolution at any time, but would it not be better to make a report to-day and have the resolution which the gentleman proposes printed so that we can have it in the House and let him call it up to-morrow?

Mr. RUCKER. I do not think it would be better, as it only goes to the form rather than to the substance.

Mr. MANN. Most of the Members are used to passing upon matters that are in the regular form.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to submit to the Speaker that no two parliamentarians sitting around me can agree on the exact phraseology which the report ought to contain.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. RUCKER. Then, how does the Speaker expect me to draw a report that will meet the views of all Members?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has the power to make such a report as his committee agrees upon.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report may be considered as in the form suggested by each of the parliamentarians who addressed the Chair. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Then you would be in such a muddle that you would never get out.

Mr. MANN. In view of the fact that we ought to adjourn some time this summer, I should have to object.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report shall be considered as containing this language: "That your committee therefore reports back as a substitute for House resolution 256 the following resolution."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the language on page 11 of the report be made to read that "the committee hereby reports back as a substitute for House resolution 256 the following resolution." Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, if this were not a privileged matter, I would not object, but being a privileged matter the gentleman can call it up at any time.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, I ask the gentleman to withhold that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. How is the committee having charge of this important matter to get rid of the charge that the gentleman from Illinois has made against the integrity of the House?

The SPEAKER. What the committee can do is to make a report something like this: That the committee hereby reports back as a substitute for the House resolution 256 the following resolution as a substitute.

Mr. RUCKER. Another parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. If the chairman goes to the committee room and prepares a report in the very language used by the Speaker, I presume that it will be held in order.

The SPEAKER. It will for a fact. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER. Can we make a report in 15 minutes and get it back here?

Mr. MANN. It would have to be on the calendar.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, I give notice that immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning I will call it up again. I would have called it up long ago if it had not been for a suggestion of the gentleman that I call it up to-day.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask a moment's indulgence to make a suggestion—I think a pertinent suggestion—in this connection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to make a suggestion to the Speaker. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER. Reserving the right to object, I want to know on what subject. The trouble is there have been too many suggestions made now. However, I will not object.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I understood it to be tacitly admitted here, at least it has been asserted and apparently not contradicted, that the resolution reported by the committee would, in and of itself, be privileged. But I call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that it merely states abstract conclusions of law—interpretations of two sections of the criminal code—without even the slightest application or reference to any facts.

Mr. MANN. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I think that the Speaker did not state that the substitute resolution would be privileged. The original resolution would be privileged, and if the substitute was germane it would come in when the resolution was reported. I think the Speaker made no decision on the other point.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the committee resolution states only abstract conclusions of law and makes no reference to the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois nor to any facts concerning any Member of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggested to the gentleman from Missouri that he report back that the committee had had under consideration the House resolution 256 and reported back the following resolution as a substitute.

SCHOONER MARIA—FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIM.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

COURT OF CLAIMS,
Washington, D. C., May 13, 1914.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Capitol.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court, made at the request of the attorney in the case and consented to by the defendants, I respectfully request the return of the dismissal of the French spoliation case of the schooner Maria, Charles Taylor, master, Nos. 2555, 2630, 4365, 633, which was certified to you December 3, 1913, and can be found in House Document No. 379, Sixty-third Congress, second session, page 8.

Very respectfully,

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the papers will be returned in accordance with the request.

Mr. MANN. I notice in the Senate yesterday that where action was taken on a similar matter the Senate adopted a resolution returning the papers, and the following provision is contained in that resolution:

And the said court is hereby authorized to proceed in such case as if no return therein had been made to the Senate.

That is on page 9226 of the RECORD of yesterday. I do not know whether that is necessary or not, but apparently it was so thought by the Committee on Claims in the Senate. If these papers are to be returned, it might be advisable to have the RECORD show a similar resolution in the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the communication may be referred to the Committee on Claims, with authority to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the communication may be referred to the Committee on Claims, with the privilege of reporting at any time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15762, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Virginia to yield to me in order that I may prefer a request for unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes to discuss what I think is a matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, if I yield it will not affect my rights at all?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Very well; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the pending motion is a motion made by the gentleman from Virginia that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did make that motion.

Mr. WINGO. And by what parliamentary rule does he now yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

The SPEAKER. He could not yield. All he had to do was to withhold his motion, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MANN. But consent has not been granted.

Mr. WINGO. Consent has not been granted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Indiana addressing the House for five minutes?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman will not press the matter at this time. I think it is important that we consider these appropriation bills and the antitrust bills and get that part of the program out of the way, with the hope, though it is a faint one, that we will yet have time to consider and agree on farm-credits and cotton-gambling legislation at this session of Congress. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Under the circumstances I shall not object at this time, but I am going to object to any further waste of time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call the attention of the membership of the House to the edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of Tuesday, May 12, which came to you this morning as a separate volume from the regular daily publication. It contains the speech and extension of remarks of one Member of Congress and covers 368 pages, mostly printed in fine, solid type. The cost of this publication as computed by the Government Printing Office is $9,941.85, and the additional necessary cost for the permanent and bound edition will be $3,819, a total cost to the taxpayers of the country of $13,760.85. If each of the 531 Members of the Congress were to pad the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD like that, it would cost the country $7,307,011.35, and to this could safely be added several more thousands as the cost of the wrapping and franking necessary to get this publication out to the reading public—in all a colossal expense.

The publication is made up almost entirely of communications from individuals and organizations on the railroad freight-rate question.

As to the merits of the question involved I have nothing to say, as that is not here under consideration. But as to the justice and propriety of such printing and franking extravagance I want to be heard. There has never been such an abuse of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD printing and franking privilege since I have been a Member of this House. That the substance of the communications and the names of the authors would have been all sufficient any sensible man can readily see. That the purpose of the bulky publication is to exploit a name or an issue many will surmise; and that the unnecessary, extravagant expense is an outrage upon the taxpayers of the country everybody will admit.

Mr. MURDOCK rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order. He is making reference to a Member of another body.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not heard the gentleman from Indiana mention anyone's name.

Mr. BARNHART. How does the gentleman know I am referring to a Member of another body?

Mr. MURDOCK. I followed the gentleman, and everyone knows that he is.

Mr. BARNHART. I have not said so.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the Chair will hear me, the gentleman referred to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Tuesday of this week, and he named the number of pages of the volume, and told to what it related, and everyone here who has examined the RECORD knows that he is referring to a Member of another body. He stated that it was printed by a Member of Congress. That is true; but the Member of Congress is a United States Senator.

The SPEAKER. If he were commenting on what a Senator said or anything of that kind, if the rule were strictly construed, it would shut him out, and yet I have heard Senators quoted here time and again, and have done it myself, without objection. It is against the rule; but in this case the House has as much jurisdiction over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as has the Senate, and the gentleman from Indiana was not discussing any gentleman in the Senate by name. He is discussing what he finds in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. BARNHART. I have not even mentioned the Senate.

Mr. MURDOCK. So far as the gentleman confines himself to the proposition of the merits or demerits of printing this much in the RECORD at one time, well and good. But the gentleman begins an attack upon a Member of the other body by saying he was seeking to exploit his name.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; the gentleman did not.

Mr. MURDOCK. And I would be out of order to mention it, and I do not propose to do it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman is out of order now in interrupting the gentleman who is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana did not say he was a Senator, but he said he was a Member of Congress.

Mr. HENRY. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled, and the gentleman from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman just a question there?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. On page 7734 is published a diagram. According to the rules no Member of the House can have diagrams published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD except on authority and approval of the Joint Committee on Printing. Did the Joint Committee on Printing give consent to that?

Mr. BARNHART. The joint committee has held that it is within the rule that the insertion in the RECORD of a single-page size of a map of the United States or any line drawing illustrating a point in hand is permissible.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARNHART. Gentlemen, this one abuse of the printing and franking privilege, at a cost of $13,760.85, is the strongest illustration of the importance of at once considering and passing the printing bill, introduced in both House and Senate, that could possibly be given. Under the provisions of the proposed law no Member will be permitted to inflict extension-of-remarks expense upon the people of more than four RECORD pages without a resolution duly and regularly passed to that effect. It is a flaming suggestion of our duty to stop such impositions upon the Public Treasury, and stop it now, and I hope every Member of the House will assist the Printing Committee to secure early and favorable consideration of this important matter.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I will yield in a moment.

In addition to the abolition of such abuses as this, the new printing law will give Members of Congress what their constituents need in the matter of printing; it will stop the franking and printing waste; it will give much relief in many other respects, and save a million dollars a year in unnecessary and useless expense. [Applause.]

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think I am in agreement with the gentleman in this, that I would like to see the RECORD of Congress an actual record of the day's proceedings, but how on earth are we going to reach the gentleman's bill under the present situation? The gentleman has said that if Members of Congress will aid him in reaching that bill——

Mr. BARNHART. I will answer the question——

Mr. MURDOCK. All right; I want to know.

Mr. BARNHART. Just help us to get consideration of this bill and we will easily show you.

Mr. MURDOCK. How can we help? I am anxious to help, but Calendar Wednesday is occupied, you are going to do away with Unanimous Consent Monday, you have a continuing order which is privileged, and the antitrust bills are waiting also, and for them a special rule is proposed. Now, how can we reach the bill? I am anxious to do it.

Mr. ADAIR. After the antitrust bills are passed.

Mr. BARNHART. As soon as we get through with the antitrust bill I think there will be found a way, if the gentleman will join me, to bring the matter up and get it through.

Mr. MURDOCK. I sincerely hope there will be.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I want to suggest to my colleague from Indiana, that there is nothing to keep us from meeting some night and considering that bill?

Mr. BARNHART. That is the purpose in contemplation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Senator who inserted these remarks in the RECORD needs no defense from me; he is quite able to take care of himself. I think at first blush every one who received that copy of the RECORD naturally thought it was an abuse of the printing privilege, yet the Senate has given to that Senator the right to print these documents in the RECORD. Undoubtedly, as disclosed by the RECORD itself, the Senator who printed these documents believed that a widespread effort, which might almost be called a conspiracy, was being made to improperly influence the Interstate Commerce Commission in reference to the most important question which has ever been brought before that commission, and the only way possible for him to demonstrate or endeavor to demonstrate his opinion and his position was by the publication of those documents; and while $13,000 is a considerable sum of money, it is a mere bagatelle compared with the value involved in the proposition pending before the commission and with the money involved pending before the commission. I have seen a great deal of matter published in the RECORD, extending over many more than 368 pages, of no public importance, without objection, and I have no desire to criticize a matter where there is public importance and not private effort——

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman from Illinois is not in favor of continuing the abuse of publishing all sorts of communications in the RECORD, is he?

Mr. MANN. I am not saying that this was an abuse, so I am not in a position to answer the question. I am as particular as any Member in this House against abuses of the printing privilege, and if all gentlemen of the House would be as careful about it as I am the RECORD would not be so long; and when great numbers of pages are printed in the RECORD simply and solely for the benefit of home consumption and the reelection of individual Members of Congress, I am not disposed to criticize some one who inserts something because he believes it is of public importance.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 15503. An act authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to the Republic of Chile.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4377) to provide for the construction of four revenue cutters.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2860) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WALSH, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. KENYON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4553. An act to authorize the appointment of an ambassador to Argentina.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2860, insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. While it is irregular, the Chair will entertain the motion. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2860. An act providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] asks unanimous consent to take the bill S. 2860 from the Speaker's table, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. RUCKER, Mr. BROUSSARD, and Mr. AINEY.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, may I have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a moment? I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the report heretofore made on House resolution 256.

Mr. MANN. Withdraw Report No. 655.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] asks unanimous consent to withdraw Report No. 655 and asks leave to file an amended one. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 15762. A bill making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how much more time there is for general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has 72 minutes and the other side has 2 hours.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] to consume some of his time now.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I have just received a very interesting letter from Col. Goethals, Governor of the Panama Canal Zone. It contains some statistics not hitherto published. A couple of months ago I requested the Washington office of the Panama Canal Commission to give me statistics showing the number of deaths which occurred during the building of the Panama Canal and the number of accidents and the number of deaths from fevers. The office at Washington was not able to give me that information and said that no statistics had ever been compiled. I am just in receipt of a letter from Col. Goethals saying that they have completed a tabulation of the statistics, and, as his letter is short, I will read it. It is as follows:

CULEBRA, April 30, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE M. YOUNG,
Representative in Congress, Washington, D. C.

SIR: A copy of your letter of the 23d ultimo to the Washington office of the Isthmian Canal Commission, desiring to know how many persons connected with the building of the canal lost their lives through accidents, how many received personal injuries from accidents, and how many suffered or died from malaria or other fevers, was referred to this office for direct reply.

Our records do not give all the information desired but show the following:

May 1, 1904 to Mar. 31, 1914, lives lost through accidents covers only those deaths which resulted from accidents happening on the work, except that it includes 167 deaths from accidental drowning, all of which did not occur on the work)	1,219
Aug. 1, 1908, to Mar. 31, 1914, accidents resulting in injuries	25,101
May 1, 1904, to Mar. 31, 1914, suffered from malaria fever	98,785
May 1, 1904, to Mar. 31, 1914, deaths from malaria fever	743
Jan. 1, 1907, to Mar. 31, 1914, suffered from typhoid fever	1,162
Jan. 1, 1907, to Mar. 31, 1914, deaths from typhoid fever	228

Respectfully,

GEO. W. GOETHALS,
Governor.

You will notice that the loss of life through accidents was 1,219. That is more than were killed during the entire War of 1812 and more than were killed during the Mexican War. You will notice, also, that the accidents resulting in injuries were 25,101, doubtless many of them permanently disabled; those who suffered from malaria fever, over 98,000; deaths from malaria fever, 743; suffered from typhoid fever, 1,162; and deaths from typhoid fever, 228.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. BARTON. I was, indeed, surprised to learn of the great number that we had lost through sickness, death, and accidents, and I want to ask the gentleman, inasmuch as he used the comparison of the War of 1812 and the Mexican War, if he knows how many men were lost during the Spanish-American War, and how that loss would compare with the loss we have had on the Panama Canal Zone?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that Gen. SHERWOOD, of Ohio, gave statistics along those lines in an address here a few months ago. The number killed or who died on the battle field, and from wounds, in the Spanish-American War, was 267, and in the Mexican War those who died from wounds or were killed in battle numbered 1,049. In the War of 1812 the number that were killed on the battle field or afterwards died from wounds was 1,085. For purposes of comparison perhaps the casualties during the war of the Philippine insurrection should be added to those of the Spanish-American War. I have not been able to obtain the statistics respecting the war of the Philippine insurrection, but they were much greater than the Spanish-American War.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. These statistics which are given include all classes of employees, not American solely, but every employee during the 10 years?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I should say so. The letter is quite plain.

Adding the number of deaths caused by accident and by fever together, connected with the work on the Panama Canal Zone, makes a total of 2,190. Now, that is more than were killed or died from wounds in the Revolutionary War. In that war there were 1,735 who lost their lives on the battle field or who afterwards died from wounds received on the battle field. It is more than the total of the War of 1812 and the Mexican War together. And to anyone who has not considered the tremendous cost of the canal from the standpoint of brain, muscle, blood, and suffering, these statistics are a revelation. The cost of the Panama Canal can not be measured in dollars and cents. It is a great American enterprise, and its control without foreign dictation is of supreme importance to the Nation.

BISMARCK TRIBUNE'S ATTACK.

Mr. Chairman, the Tribune, published at Bismarck, N. Dak., has questioned the honesty of my position upon the Panama Canal tolls-repeal bill. It has without foundation in fact, justification, or excuse insinuated that I was influenced by the Shipping Trust. It is my desire at all times to be courteous and fair to opponents as well as friends, and I shall endeavor to use language tempered with moderation.

There was a time when the Bismarck Tribune had much influence under the talented editorial management of Marshall Jewell. But under its present editorial management it has become the special advocate and sponsor for the railroad interests. It even advocates the raising of railroad rates.

RAILROADS ANTAGONISTIC TO CANAL.

Mr. Chairman, what has been the attitude of the railroads with respect to the Panama Canal? It has been one of constant opposition and relentless antagonism from beginning to end. When the problem of building the canal was only a dream, when it was being agitated, the railroads through their publicity bureaus sought to create the belief that, if it could be built at all, it would require a hundred years and countless treasure. They have discouraged it in every conceivable way. They have feared its competition, and since the adoption of free tolls to coastwise shipping in 1910 it has been a constant nightmare to them.

Now, a word as to the Coastwise Shipping Trust. It is a demonstrated fact that 92 per cent of the coastwise shipping is owned by the railroads. No man upon this floor will deny it, and everyone knows that the railroads have been active in their support of any proposition which would force the payment of tolls upon all shipping.

SHIPPING TRUST A DECOY.

Nevertheless, the Bismarck Tribune has made a cowardly insinuation that my vote was influenced by the Shipping Trust. Knowing that 92 per cent of the coastwise shipping is owned by the railroad companies, no sane man will believe that the railroad companies who have maintained a lobby will permit a trust controlled by them to maintain a lobby opposing them. The fact is there has been only one lobby in connection with this legislation, that of the railroads, and they have been foxy enough to start the cry that the Shipping Trust was seeking to influence legislation. It has been done with the idea of fooling the public and it may have succeeded to a certain extent, but I rather think in the long run the people will catch on to the methods used to cloud and obscure the real purposes of the railroad companies, and I do not think there is a farmer or merchant in my district who can be made to believe that the railroad companies maintained a lobby down here against free tolls and then financed another lobby upon the part of their own offspring to oppose them. The Shipping Trust has simply permitted itself to be played up to the people by its owners, the railroad companies, as a decoy to fool those who pay the freight.

This condition of affairs is well illustrated by the sworn testimony of Timothy E. Byrnes, former vice president of the New Haven Railroad, who testified this week before the Interstate Commerce Commission. He made oath that the sum of $1,000, paid by the Four Rivers Shipping Co. to Clarence W. De Knight, of Washington, for services in connection with Panama legislation, in reality came from the treasury of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad.

THE PARAMOUNT QUESTION.

It was the belief of many of us in the House that from the economic standpoint all ships passing through the canal should be required to pay tolls, but as Great Britain had demanded the repeal of the free-tolls provision respecting coastwise or domestic shipping, claiming that it was a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we believed that if, in response to that demand, the tolls provision were repealed, it would amount to an acknowledgment that the English interpretation of the treaty was correct, and which would later interfere with our orderly and proper control of the canal in other respects. It would be a surrender of American rights without even so much as requiring the question to be arbitrated. We believed that the treaty rights of the United States should be safeguarded and that the free-tolls provision should not be repealed at so great an expense as the relinquishment of those rights. We were of the opinion that, as the people's directors, voting in respect to a great public enterprise which had cost many lives and the huge sum of $400,000,000, it was our duty to protect American rights in the canal and that we ought not to pass the bill without amendment; that it would be folly to do so.

Under the special rule amendments were not permitted, but one of the Members from Rhode Island, a Democrat, made a motion to recommit the bill with instructions to add to it an amendment for the purpose of safeguarding the treaty rights of the United States. I voted for the bill in that form; but the word having gone forth that the bill was to be passed without change, the motion to recommit was lost. Consequently, I voted "no" on the final roll call. And I would vote the same way again if the question were to come up in the same form if it were my last act on earth.

A COMPLETE VINDICATION.

What has happened since? The Senate committee, after having made a searching inquiry and after having studied it thoroughly, reported to the Senate, recommending that the Panama Canal bill be amended by adding the following:

That neither the passage of this act nor anything therein contained shall be construed or held as waiving, impairing, or affecting any treaty or other right possessed by the United States.

That amendment received the support in the committee of all the Democratic members, was framed by Senator SIMMONS, the Democratic chairman of the committee, and was offered after having received the approval of the President of the United States.

So those of us who wanted the bill amended in the House have been vindicated by the action of the Senate committee, and I venture to predict that our position will also be vindicated by a majority of the Senate, and that the President of the United States will approve the bill with the amendment included therein.

DANGERS AHEAD.

If the amendment is not included it would be supreme folly. If not so amended, what will be the next move? The three great transcontinental railways of Canada—the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian Northern—will join again in an application to Great Britain to protest against the exclusion of railroad-owned ships which are now barred from the use of the canal by law. They will claim it a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in that it is a discrimination. If we pass the bill now without a definite provision declaring and reasserting our rights under the treaty Great Britain will rely upon the passage of this act by Congress as establishing their right to also be freed from the discrimination as to railroad-owned ships, and if the Canadian ships of railroad ownership are permitted to pass through the canal, then the next move of the American railroads will be to demand that they have equal treatment with their competitors, the Canadian railroads. Those are the questions which will inevitably be forced upon us if the Senate fails to incorporate into the canal bill the provision offered in the House and proposed by the Senate committee to preserve our treaty rights. Now is the time to stand out against the designs of the railroad companies with respect to this, perhaps the greatest, American enterprise.

TRIBUNE SPEAKS FOR RAILROADS.

Mr. Chairman, it is also a significant fact that the Bismarck Tribune carried an editorial a few weeks ago strongly supporting the railway companies in their application to the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase railway rates. Those whom the Tribune seeks to mislead should ponder that fact.

In one of its editorials attacking Senator CUMMINS, I find this statement worthy of the dark ages:

If we starve the railroads, we starve ourselves. That is an economic truth our friends, the politicians, should take home.

It is doubtful if that wild statement would have commanded respect even in the days of the corrupt Horace Walpole.

Mr. Chairman, this is the kind of newspaper, so called, which has attempted and would, if it could, rob me of a good reputation. I do not believe the attacks of the Tribune will weaken the faith of the people in me, and I doubt if even the accustomed readers of the Tribune will follow its leadership in this respect.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that this is a question which may be viewed from many angles by honest men. There is the question of the meaning of the treaty, the economic and other sides. I respect the rights of others to vote according to their consciences. I claim the same privilege for myself.

CHARGES FALSE IN EVERY PARTICULAR.

Now, to sum up:

First. Ninety-two per cent of the coastwise shipping, the only shipping affected by this bill, is owned by the railroad companies.

Second. The railways want tolls as high as possible and the canal burdened by as many treaty restrictions as possible.

Third. The Bismarck Tribune openly stands for higher freight rates, is the willing tool of the railroads, and knows its master's voice.

Fourth. It has attempted to mislead the people and defame me.

Fifth. Its charges are base, cowardly, and absolutely false in every particular.

I presume the Tribune, stung by the truth, will continue its abuse of me, but I have too much faith in the intelligence of the people of the district I have the honor to represent to believe that many of them will be fooled or misled by it. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I notice in this bill provisions for an appropriation for the Interparliamentary Union, the Pan-American Union, the Fifth Conference of the American States, and other items looking to a better condition of international relationship between our country and other countries, and I want to address myself to the relationship of North America—or, rather, the United States—to the South American and Central American countries, including Mexico. I want to call attention of the membership of the House to the meaning of our foreign policy. The foreign policy of the country might be considered as couched into two Executive decrees. One is known as the neutrality law, or neutrality rule, announced by President Washington in 1794, and the other might be known as the Monroe doctrine, announced by Monroe in 1823.

The first was occasioned by a situation in Europe affecting England and France. France had assisted us in the Revolutionary War by the French Alliance of 1778, secured by Benjamin Franklin, and when France was in difficulty with England, later on, a representative of the French Government—Citizen Genet—came to our country to win favor on the part of our Government to France.

Citizen Genet, as the student of history will recall, did not land at Philadelphia, the capital of the country at that time, but he landed at Charleston, S. C., and then made his way up to Philadelphia, and on his way was received with great ovations at various points, which encouraged him to declare that if the President of the United States did not assist France in her struggle he would appeal from the President to the people at large. That at once induced President Washington to announce his famous doctrine of neutrality, which in a sense offended France, because of a conviction that it showed ingratitude; but it is the doctrine to which we then subscribed, that when Europe is in trouble we ought to keep our hands off—that we ought to attend to our own affairs. That doctrine has been studiously and religiously observed from that day to this, so far as I know.

In 1823 a second doctrine—the Monroe doctrine, which completes our foreign policy—was announced. That was announced by James Monroe, then our President. However, it was written by John Quincy Adams, his Secretary of State, and it was probably initiated by George Canning, the prime minister of Great Britain. The Monroe doctrine is the outgrowth of the Napoleonic wars, which not only unsettled absolutism in Europe but on account of those wars all South America and Central America, then under the dominion of Spain, became disturbed.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. FESS. With pleasure.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman says that the Monroe doctrine was probably originated by Canning. That has always been supposedly true, but very recently has, it is strongly asserted, been proven not true. The gentleman will find what purports to be a complete refutation of the Canning claim by consulting a document presented in the Senate and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a few weeks ago. According to that analysis of the acts, speeches, and letters of Canning and others, Canning did not initiate the doctrine.

Mr. FESS. I will accept the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin, with the privilege, however, of making a further investigation. I always understood that George Canning was really the one person that initiated the movement which ultimately led to the formulation of the Monroe doctrine. The position of England would lead me to believe that such a doctrine would be most welcome to the British Empire.

What I was going to say was that the Napoleonic wars had unsettled absolutism in Europe. All South America sought independence, except Brazil and the Guianas. Mexico also sought and secured her independence from Spain. A congress was called by four countries, not specially to protest against anything in America, but to consider what ought to be done in the interest of the monarchical forms in Europe, which were being overturned by Napoleon. Then another congress was called at Verona, and finally the Holy Alliance, consisting in 1822 of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, was established. You will notice that England, which was a part of the first congress, dropped out at this time.

This Holy Alliance made the famous announcement that it was to the interest of the peace of the world that the South American Provinces that had proclaimed their independence should return to their allegiance under Spain. This was the movement that stirred Great Britain's ministry, and especially Mr. Canning; and, as I said before, I understood that Mr. Canning consulted with Dr. Richard Rush, then our minister to England, who communicated the matter to our Secretary of State, John Quincy Adams, who looked upon the suggestion with favor and formulated the doctrine. In 1823 James Monroe put it in his message.

Whether this be absolutely correct or not I, of course, must be somewhat in doubt since the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has made his statement, because I know he would not make the statement without pretty thorough investigation.

In 1823, however, the Monroe doctrine was simply this: Any attempt on the part of a European country to extend colonization in the Western Continent would be regarded by our Government as unfriendly.

Then, in 1826, the Pan American mission was called. It was to meet at Panama and is known in history as the Panama Mission. Our country was to be represented, but in the selection of the delegates the question was raised by John C. Calhoun as to the subjects to be discussed. And when it was outlined it included one sensitive question, namely, the abolition of the slave trade. Mr. Calhoun took the position that probably our country should not enter upon a discussion of such a sensitive question where so many other countries had a voting power, and consequently John C. Calhoun opposed the appointment of a delegate to this mission. However, he was outvoted and a delegate was appointed, but he died before he reached the mission, and consequently the Pan American mission of 1826 was held without a representative from our Government. Among other resolutions of the mission it passed one that led to the recognition of the Monroe doctrine, enunciated three years before.

In 1846 the treaty of New Granada, which really gave us a partial control over a strip of land across the Isthmus, and also placed upon us the obligation to guarantee to Colombia a certain sovereignty in the Isthmus, was made. I refer to the treaty of New Granada by which we again made a reaffirmation of the Monroe doctrine.

Then, in 1847, occurred the Yucatan episode. The Indians, who formed two-thirds of the population, rebelled against the whites who were in control. Finally the Government appealed to the United States to establish a protectorate over that country. The United States declined to do it. Then Yucatan appealed to Spain, then to England, and finally to the three countries, and asked us to effect a tripartite joint protectorate over Yucatan in the interest of order.

Now, I call special attention of the membership of this House to this most remarkable position of our country: We declined to establish a protectorate Then we forbade Yucatan having a protectorate established for her by three countries—one in the Western Continent and two in Europe—and we did it on the ground that that would involve the Monroe doctrine, and that if we left the matter of the control of any country in the Western World to a joint protectorate, two parties to which were European States, then we had surrendered the Monroe doctrine, because it had given two votes to one; and we not only refused to do it, but we refused to allow Spain and England to do it. That was in 1847—the most far-reaching step this country has taken upon the interpretation of the real meaning of the Monroe doctrine. It meant that Europe could not interfere, even when she was invited to do so by the American country in interest.

Then, in 1850, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was entered into, and while all citizens of this country regretted it as an unwise treaty, mark you, this country never intended to do it except on account of one consideration, namely, a committal of Great Britain to the Monroe doctrine. It was so stated when it was made, and Richard Olney, in 1896, made the statement that Great Britain in that treaty did recognize the Monroe doctrine. In 1854 the Ostend manifesto, that looked to the purchase of Cuba, was proposed by our three ministers to England, France, and Spain, in which we set out our right to possess Cuba because of her position in the continent. The proposal was repudiated by our own country. This claim was put upon the doctrine that gives the dominant voice on this continent to the United States in matters pertaining to all American issues.

Later James Buchanan resumed efforts to bind Great Britain to the Monroe doctrine, and at the same time to release us from the unfortunate obligations in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Now, it is not necessary for me to go further into the history here, other than simply to say that in 1863 Abraham Lincoln, through William H. Seward, reannounced the Monroe doctrine. In 1867 Andrew Johnson sent Phil. Sheridan at the head of 50,000 soldiers to the Mexican border, and commanded France to withdraw, which was done.

In 1878 Gen. Hayes, through William M. Evarts, one of our greatest international lawyers, took a new view, and said that the constructing of a canal across the Isthmus by our own country would be justified, because the canal would be a part of our coast line, and we could do it in spite of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. He partly relied upon the force of the Monroe doctrine.

In 1881 James G. Blaine, then Secretary of State, called the first Pan American Congress to meet in this country. The death of President Garfield cut short the sitting of that congress, and consequently it was delayed until 1889, when the second congress was called by Blaine, then Secretary of State under President Harrison. That congress sat in session for six months.

The dominance of our country in American matters was emphasized in 1881 through the correspondence of Blaine on the canal proposition as affected by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and reemphasized in 1889 in the Pan American Congress of that year. This idea that the United States is the dominant power in this continent, not only of North America but of Mexico and Central America and South America, is an American doctrine. It is not partisan. It has been indorsed by all parties. It was announced in 1823 by James Monroe, a Democrat; reaffirmed in 1826 by John Quincy Adams, a National Republican; and in 1846 and again in 1847 by James K. Polk, a Democrat; and in 1850 by Millard Fillmore, a Whig; and in 1854 by Franklin Pierce, a Democrat; and in 1857 by James Buchanan, a Democrat; and in 1863 by Abraham Lincoln; 1867 by Andrew Johnson; 1878 by Rutherford B. Hayes; 1881 by James A. Garfield, through his Secretary of State; and by Benjamin Harrison, William McKinley, Theodore Roosevelt, and William Howard Taft, all Republicans; in 1887 and again in 1893 by Grover Cleveland, a distinguished Democrat. Every single party that has controlled this Government since 1823 has taken an affirmative position upon that question. And singularly enough with each successive administration it has taken on newer and greater scope.

Now, we hear it claimed that the doctrine is a serious one, and that probably we ought to give it up. I have read it in the press, and I have heard it from the lips of Members of this House, that the Monroe doctrine is a hot potato, which we would drop instantly if we could, but it seems that we can not. It is apparent that there are persons who want to drop it. I am wondering whether that really is true, and how deep is the conviction and how widespread the wish so frequently heard expressed. I have noted in the press, and I have also heard from Members of this House, that the present Mexican mediation proposition of the A. B. C. countries will commit South America to the Monroe doctrine. These expressions are adulatory, commending the step as a distinct achievement. I speak guardedly, for I am one of the Members of the House who would not wish in any way to say anything that would disturb the efforts on the part of the administration to prevent war by methods of peace. But I have heard that the mediation proposition by the three South American countries is the one claim whereby we will commit South America to the Monroe doctrine. I wish to call attention to a possible serious complication. It is generally understood that Mexico hates the Monroe doctrine. She hates our flag; I mean some of the Mexicans do. I have no way to tell how general it is. The present Government spurns it. Some of them insult it; and I am told by people who have been in Mexico that some of the Mexicans spit upon our flag, and that they resent the idea of the big brother. Many Central Americans take the same position. Usually the more irresponsible the country the more resentment it displays. South America is taking the same position. It is well known how Colombia regards us, and how all southern countries sympathize with her. It is quite well understood that Argentina, Brazil, and Chile resent the idea that we assume to be the guardian and they the wards; that we are exercising a sort of suzerainty over those countries. Like Venezuela, which we saved from serious controversy with Germany in 1902, they dislike it. They resent it. This feeling is quite general and well known to us. Secretaries have made extended trips and toured the countries to create a better feeling. I have understood that the mediation proposition is looked upon as the one step which may alleviate that situation, and that ultimately, instead of the Monroe doctrine, we will make a Pan American doctrine whereby we will unify all the countries of South and Central America in the adoption of that doctrine. This is evidently in the minds of all the eulogists of the plan of the A. B. C. mediation.

Now, Members of the House, this is what I rose to speak about. I want to ask the pertinent question, Is there any danger, in the accomplishment of these statesmen, that mediation is a supersession of the Monroe doctrine? Does it mean that we are taking a step for a Pan American doctrine to supersede the Monroe doctrine? This is the professed purpose of many who affect to be interested in its success. What would be the difference? How does a Pan American doctrine such as John Barrett would like differ from the Monroe doctrine? Why, the Monroe doctrine is based upon the position that the United States is the dominant party on the western continent when there is any question in dispute with Europe pertaining to the western continent; that is, this country is not compelled to get the consent of any country before it can state a position in matters of interest to the western world. There are those who say that when the Monroe doctrine was announced it was necessary, but that the necessity has passed away, and we ought now to give it up. They assert that in 1823 we were weak and the western world was subject to exploitation, but to-day we are strong and the South is no longer in danger. There are Members in this House who want us to give it up. They claim there is no contention in Europe to extend monarchy as in 1823. They speak in favor of releasing us from the obligation because it is unnecessary, it is not wanted, and it is destined to give us trouble. But I am afraid of such a position, and I frankly confess that I am afraid of the possibilities that are included in a mediation proposition where the representatives of three countries, all of which are opposed to the Monroe doctrine, will be in a position to adjudicate questions pertaining to American policies. If, as has been professed, the object of this mediation is to unify all the Americas, including Mexico, back of the Monroe doctrine—if that be the purpose, then I ask you upon what basis is the Pan American doctrine to operate? How many countries will make up the union which must be consulted before action can be taken? To the United States you will add Mexico, 6 Central American countries, and 9 South American countries, excluding the Guianas and Canada. Or would you include these European provinces? There will be at least 16 sovereign countries to be consulted. If you are going to effect a Pan American doctrine in which there are 16 units, how much authority will the United States have, and how much do you give to each individual unit? How much will you give to the little country of Costa Rica, an independent Republic with a government like our own, with a population less than 400,000, less than the population of the city of Detroit? How much authority will you give to Guatemala, with less than the population of Chicago? How much will you give to Honduras? How much to Salvador? How much are you going to give to each individual in the six Central American countries, whose entire population is about that of my own State of Ohio? How much will you give to all South America, with its 35,000,000 people, 17,000,000 of whom are Indians and 10,000,000 of whom are negroes?

There are perhaps not more than eleven to twelve million of European people in all South America. What part of the vote—in this Pan American Union, the Pan American policy that is to supersede the Monroe doctrine—how much of a vote are you going to give to the individual 16 units?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Nebraska stated a few minutes ago that this was a new application of the 16-to-1 principle. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. It probably is from the later utterances I have heard. I have understood that our distinguished Secretary of State, distinguished as the 16-to-1 statesman, says that this is what is to be done, that we are to unify South America and Central America back of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I think in this very important matter before the House that there ought to be a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WINGO). The Chair understood the gentleman from Ohio to yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma for a question.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Oklahoma can not get recognition for a question and then make a point of order of no quorum.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma was not recognized by the Chair, and the gentleman from Ohio did not yield to him for the purpose of making a point of no quorum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a Member at any time can make a point of no quorum, because the Constitution and the rules require that a quorum shall be present. This is as much a part of the business of the House as any.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if I can be interrupted except by a point of order relating to myself as to whether I am in order or not? Can I be interrupted upon a point of no quorum?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly. There has never been any variation of the ruling in the House; a point of no quorum can be made at any time, whether a Member has the floor or not. I hope, however, that the gentleman from Oklahoma will withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me on the point of order?

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Oklahoma will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the Chair is of the opinion that the spirit of the rule should be observed rather than the form, and while it is true that, technically, a point of order can be raised at any time——

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, it has happened a hundred times in the last five years that Members have been taken off their feet by a point of order, either that they were not discussing the pending measure or impropriety in debate or a point of no quorum.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. When I am on the floor I can be interrupted by anybody at any time on a point of order applying to my conduct, but I want to know whether I can be interrupted by a call for a quorum?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; it does not lie with any Member who has the floor to determine whether there is a quorum in committee. That would be taking it out of the power of the committee to have a quorum and leave it in the power of one man.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, on reflection, thinks that he is in error and that the gentleman from Illinois is correct. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-eight Members are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following-named Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. RUSSELL having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WINGO, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15762, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, and, finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, that 272 Members had answered to their names, a quorum, and he reported the list of the absentees to the House.

The committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FINLEY). The gentleman from Ohio is recognized. He has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted by the point of no quorum I confessed it was a new experience for me. I have often seen audience rooms emptied, and have helped to empty them, but this is the first time that any friend on the side line secured an audience upon a point of no quorum when a speaker was on his feet.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The audience did not know that the gentleman was going to talk. If they had, they would have all remained. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. I thank the gentleman; but I am afraid that what will occur within the next 15 minutes will disprove his statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I was just raising the question if we supersede the Monroe doctrine by what is called the Pan American doctrine, upon what basis would each individual unit that makes up this Pan American doctrine vote? I refer to the fact that if we take all the countries of South America and Central America, including Mexico, and make out of them, with ourselves, a Pan American union, and announce a Pan American doctrine instead of the Monroe doctrine, then what vote would you give each unit that makes up this union when we come to settle any particular question affecting any country such as now is covered by our conception of the Monroe doctrine? I am concerned about that particular situation that might grow out of the mediation situation or proposals that might be made by the mediators. As long as there is any problem between the United States and Europe or between any of the American countries or all of the American countries on one side and Europe on the other, that problem heretofore has been solved by our own country, and we have refused to submit to arbitration by European countries any question that would involve the integrity of the Monroe doctrine.

We have constantly refused to submit to arbitration any question involving the Monroe doctrine by any country or any set of countries. For this position we have been unjustly criticized, but always by the opponents of the Monroe doctrine. We have not only refused to arbitrate the Monroe doctrine with Europe as arbitrators, but we have refused to submit the question for arbitration to American countries. We have stood from the beginning until now upon the fundamental principle that the Monroe doctrine, an American doctrine, must not be interpreted by any but our own country. We have never used any latitude or extended its interpretation to any South American countries, to any Central American countries, or to Mexico, or to all of them combined.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The Monroe doctrine involves the relation of European countries with countries in the Americas.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. And the Pan American doctrine involves, does it not, the relation of the American countries with each other? And does not the gentleman see how it will be possible to maintain the Monroe doctrine against the noninterference of European nations and at the same time have a Pan American doctrine for the interrelation of American Republics?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Missouri for the question, because it introduces another delicate situation, as I see it. He asks whether the Monroe doctrine is not a doctrine that applies to Europe and America, while the Pan American doctrine would not apply to Europe, but would apply simply to the Americas. I answer him that if we become involved in any question of mediation, as in the matter of Mexico, where the situation involved the rights of citizens of foreign countries—citizens of Germany and citizens of England, as well as citizens of France and other countries—we can not make it purely an American doctrine confined to American interests. In the Mexican situation as it now stands European interests are at stake. In the mediation we are involving European interests, or at least such interests must be considered before Mexico can hope to be at peace. To-day Sir Edward Grey announces that he has a solution of the Mexican situation. Suppose that solution be submitted to the mediators. I want to know what authority we have, if we submit it to the mediators, to say to the mediators, "You can not consider that problem or anything pertaining to the interests of Europe."

Mr. BORLAND. That is very easily answered. The mediators have no power to make a final decision in any event. They are compelled to submit any proposals to us.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They are acting merely in an advisory capacity.

Mr. FESS. On the other hand, if the mediators act purely in an advisory capacity, and will submit a plan that represents the judgment of the mediating body made up of representatives of three great nations, and we, because of our right to do so, refuse to agree to it, then our problem is complicated. It shows either bad faith on our part or that we have no confidence in the work of our mediators. To have declined at the outset unless the sphere was well defined would have been no offense. But to reject the findings I fear will offend deeply all South-American and Central-American countries. Is it not dangerous, because of the very thing the gentleman asks, that we may involve ourselves in a situation that will be a virtual surrender of the Monroe doctrine or else offend these countries because we stand on the Monroe doctrine? That is certainly a possibility, if not a probability. That is the situation that makes it serious and critical to my mind.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is assuming in his subconscious mind that this proposal that the mediators are going to submit would involve a surrender of the Monroe doctrine as to European nations, and that is not a supposable proposition at the present time.

Mr. FESS. I should think that would be a fair assumption. The Mexican situation involves more than a dispute between us and Huerta. If not, why attempt to induce the constitutionalists to join? Does it not involve European interests? If these mediators receive suggestions from outside countries in Europe, like England, through Sir Edward Grey, or other countries through their representatives, it is too late to say they are not concerned. These countries, it seems to me, are the very countries that must not extend their influence in Mexico or in Central America or in South America, yet they, next to ourselves, are most interested because of European citizens and European property in Mexico. The very fact that we have passed over to the mediators for solution a critical question that pertains to the interests of four European powers as well as a dispute between us and Huerta it seems to me gives them authority to consider the rights of these powers. And if so, then what is the probable consequences of giving a body of men a subject that we ourselves would not allow any country to adjudicate?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Is it not true, having reference to the question of the gentleman from Missouri, that Argentina, Brazil, and Chile all feel more or less keenly that the Monroe doctrine has already served its purpose and might well be set aside?

Mr. FESS. I stated that fact before the gentleman from Michigan came into the Chamber.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. FESS (continuing). In the outset I stated that this mediation is now in the hands of representatives of countries who resent the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is the point to which I was calling the gentleman's attention.

Mr. FESS. And it is a problem, it seems to me, of submitting to that group of people, or any other group who resent it, a question that might involve the very thing we do not want, namely, the surrender of the Monroe doctrine, which they do not like. Mediation of a question involving the Monroe doctrine by countries which resent the doctrine is serious.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Does not the gentleman think when he refers to European influences that it would hardly be an interference with the Monroe doctrine for a European nation to exercise its friendly influence of persuasion, of suggestion, or any other method of that kind? That certainly would not be interference with the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. FESS. That reminds me of the fact, if the gentleman will recollect. In 1898 Europe made overtures to President McKinley, offering their good offices to settle the difficulties between us and Spain. President McKinley thanked them in a most courteous manner for their friendly offices and went on to state that this was a matter that pertained to the welfare of our Nation as well as humanity, and gave those countries to understand that it was a problem that we must settle, and we proceeded to settle it. We could have accepted their good offices, but it might have proved serious.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I think that is true, yet certainly the United States maintains that kind of attitude with reference to that sort of influence. It welcomes it, it approves it; every friendly influence certainly ought to be approved by every man who looks for peace or anything that might tend to bring about better conditions between the countries. It is only the influence, as I understand it, that interferes with the Monroe doctrine, and has something in its nature of a protectorate, something tangible, something real, some influence that amounts to control and power, that is interfering with the Monroe doctrine, but not such influence that might perhaps be derived from a statement that might be friendly or merely in its nature suggestive in bringing about a better condition of affairs.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman answers that question, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Along the same line of the question of the gentleman from Iowa, does not The Hague conference provide especially for mediation and such other suggestions of similar character through any government, whether welcome or unwelcome? Is not that now provided for?

Mr. FESS. The Hague conference established a tribunal to adjust national difficulties, but made certain exceptions, as the distinguished Member from Virginia will note, certain exceptions specifically made in which questions of national honor and questions of vital interest were involved.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman will pardon me, the point I desired to make—perhaps I did not make myself particularly clear—is this: Did not The Hague conference promulgate a convention which specifically provided for mediation?

Mr. FESS. Yes; arbitration——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not arbitration, but mediation, which is very distinct from arbitration. Mediation is only suggestive, advisory, persuasive.

Mr. FESS. The distinguished Member from Virginia is correct in his statement. The answer I want to make to the gentleman from Iowa is this, that in the present situation we are confronted with at least two angles. The first is the pitiable situation of the people of Mexico themselves. Anybody who would study modern Mexico would note the growth of those cities, how remarkably they have grown in the last 20 years. I refer to Chihuahua, Torreon, Tampico, Durango, San Luis Potosi, and many other cities in that country, with all the modern improvements of an American city. Yet in those cities, so rapidly growing, can be seen every degree and grade of civilization known to that country. I am told that every stage of the human race, from the rich to the very poorest, can be observed, a condition that appeals to our American sense of duty. It convinces us that something is abjectly wrong with the Mexican system or their customs or laws; I do not know which it is. The situation appeals to us with pity.

Mr. MADDEN. Is not that true of American cities?

Mr. FESS. Yes; but on a different basis and from a different cause. I doubt whether we can interfere with that or not. How are we going to change conditions where 90 per cent of the people are indifferent? Now, the other point is this: In those sections American citizens have gone; European citizens have gone; the citizens of England and of Germany, of France, and of other nations have gone by invitation. Modern Mexico is due to these outside influences. England is interested and Germany is interested in the outcome of the situation. If we are going to say that we will stand upon the Monroe doctrine, that we will make it unnecessary for those countries to enter Mexico to protect the rights of their people, then it would seem that we are in duty bound to assure them that we will stand in their shoes. In order to keep them from going in we have a problem of our own. If we submit that problem to an outside body, we might concede to those countries power to repudiate the Monroe doctrine. That is the thing of which I am speaking. If England, France, and Germany had no interest there, so there could be no European problem, I would see no particular complication; but as I see it now it becomes of vast public concern. It becomes a European and an American problem.

Mr. VAUGHAN and Mr. CLINE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CLINE. I do not understand that in the original purpose of the Monroe doctrine the three great powers that are now attempting to mediate on questions which are involved are adverse to us, but that they are in full accord with us as to the original purpose of declaring the Monroe doctrine; that is, that they are in harmony with the original purpose of the Monroe doctrine as declared against the western powers of Europe with respect to colonizing any portion of the South American Republics.

Mr. FESS. That would be indicated by their action in 1826.

Mr. CLINE. Then do you anticipate that they would be subject to any undue influence on the part of the powers of Europe?

Mr. FESS. I do, for this reason: The Monroe doctrine in 1823 was to their advantage; in 1826 it was to their advantage; in 1846 it was to their advantage; up to that time they looked upon our attitude with favor. It was because they felt they needed us; but they are resenting our attitude now in regarding them as wards of our Nation. They are unfriendly to that position. The change of tone might be due to many things.

Mr. CLINE. I understand; but as to the original purpose of the Monroe doctrine, to prevent the colonization, they are exactly in harmony with us and want to protect themselves as much as we want to protect them.

Mr. FESS. I will say that these countries might see an advantage to meet Europe's demand for certain indemnity from Mexico. I do not know what is in their minds. I am afraid of the possibility. Suppose Europe demands as a basis of settlement coaling stations in Mexico, and the adjustment is with these mediators, what should be our situation?

Mr. CLINE. Has there been a period in the whole history of the Monroe doctrine when it was as thoroughly established and as thoroughly acceded to by the western powers of Europe that it is a part of our foreign policy as now?

Mr. FESS. I want to reply to my friend from Indiana by quoting Salisbury when President Cleveland, a man, I think, of strong backbone, took the position that if England did not submit the question to arbitration in adjusting the boundary line in Venezuela that had been established from 1842 by the Schomburgk line, he would ask Congress to appoint a commission to make the investigation. This he did, and also asked Congress to give him power to stand by the report of that commission. It was on this occasion that Salisbury made this statement, the most remarkable that has ever been made by a European statesman concerning the Monroe doctrine, and I want the gentleman from Indiana to note it. He said in substance: The Monroe doctrine is not international law and can not be binding on other nations. It is a mere announcement of one country, and an announcement can not be international law, no matter how brilliant the statesman who announces it or powerful the nation that supports it.

That is Salisbury's statement.

Mr. CLINE. Is it not true that England acceded to the letter of Mr. Olney, then Secretary of State under Mr. Cleveland, before his commission had taken any evidence or made any report on the proposition?

Mr. FESS. Not until President Cleveland asked Congress to give him authority to make investigation and to support it. Then Salisbury submitted to arbitration.

Mr. CLINE. That was before any evidence was taken?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I will yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. That is all I want. I wanted the three minutes in order to state that every patriotic citizen, whether he believes in the Monroe doctrine or believes in a Pan American doctrine, is anxious that the situation in Mexico which has brought out this discussion shall pass without any more serious trouble than we have at present. And I want to make it quite specific that when I raise what I regard as a very pertinent question, I do it guardedly, because I realize that the mediators are to meet next Monday, and I am anxious to know what their province is. And I am deeply concerned about this one question, whether consulting about matters that are English and German and French and Japanese we have given over into their hands the power to make suggestions of adjustment in regard to those things. If we have, you can not answer it by saying we are not bound by what they suggest, for the moment that they make their suggestions that we can not abide by, that moment we have offended them, and more than we would have offended had we courteously said, "This matter is a concern that is American, and we go into Mexico, if we go at all, for the honor of this Nation, the rights of the citizens of this country, and for the benefit and welfare of unhappy Mexico, as well as to protect citizens of countries which we have asked not to go into Mexico now." It seems to me we ought to be pretty careful about the program that these mediators shall adopt, the questions that they are to discuss, before we do a thing that I fear will amount to a surrender of the Monroe doctrine, by giving to every little, irresponsible Republic in Central and South America the right to make all the debt it wants, float its bonds, and let them be taken in England or Germany or France, and then have these creditors come around and ask that we be their collecting agency for those irresponsible countries. It seems to me that the true American doctrine is expressed by the Monroe doctrine, not subject to adverse interpretation of other countries, and we ought not to attempt to supersede it by a Pan-American doctrine that requires us to consult 16 Republics, containing altogether 60,000,000 people, three-fourths of which are native. This country, with a hundred million people, with the sole purpose to secure the highest welfare of all concerned, is the one policing power to maintain Americanism on this continent. I hope for peace; but if war results from a blunder of diplomacy at Tampico, we can not justify ourselves in an attempt to correct the blunder by taking steps that might result in far more serious results by an abandonment of an American policy that has stood for nearly a century. I raise this as a pertinent question and to sound a warning. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. VAUGHAN].

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Chairman, it sometimes becomes necessary to remind ourselves that the Government of the United States does not possess over territory within the States the general governmental powers exercised by the other Governments of the world, but such powers only as are conferred upon it by the Constitution, and it is well to consider why this is so and why it should be so. The careful student has observed that it was the general purpose of the framers of the Constitution to confer upon the Federal Government such powers only as are necessary to enable it to maintain itself and to exercise control over transactions, affairs, and relations with foreign countries, of the States with each other, and between citizens of different States. In general, our foreign affairs and the mutual relations of the States with each other are committed to the Federal Government, and all other affairs are withheld from it and reserved to the States or to the people.

Why? That as to other nations we may act as a unit; that as to matters affecting our relations with each other the common government of all should control; and that the regulation of the civil rights of the people and the making of police regulations should be in the hands of that government which is closer home, closer to the people, more directly under their supervision, inspection, and control.

The diversified habits, customs, conditions, resources, industries, and interests of the peoples of the several States made it apparent that the people of each State could best govern themselves, for the simple reason that being better acquainted with their own situations they know best what should be done.

There is now more reason than ever for this division of the powers of government between the States and the Federal Government and this limitation upon the powers of the latter. When the Constitution was adopted we were only thirteen States, covering only a part of the Atlantic coast and a few hundred miles into the interior, and the conditions of life were simple and much more alike in the different States. We now cover the continent from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Rio Grande. If our interests were sufficiently diversified then to make it wise to divide the powers of government between the State and the Federal, as I have explained, the multiplication of that diversification and the vast extension of our territory certainly multiply the reasons for the continuation of the same wise policy.

In some States we have the simple life, worthy of the poetic description of "The Cotter's Saturday Night." In other States we have thousands huddled in the same tenement, buying their food and water, dependent upon the Government for regulations to protect them against disease and extortion, and dependent upon some individual or corporation for employment to earn a livelihood.

In some States the principal industry is raising cotton; in others, corn; in others, wheat; in others it is manufacturing implements; in others, manufacturing something else; in others it is commerce. In no territory of the same extent as that of the United States is there greater diversity of industries, occupations, resources, and conditions of life.

The candid, thoughtful man who will consider these facts will become more and more convinced that Mr. Jefferson's opinions and views of this subject accord with wisdom and common sense. Permit me to borrow his language to express a few pertinent thoughts. He said:

The extent of our country was so great and its former division into distinct States so established that we thought it better to confederate as to foreign affairs only. Every State retained its self-government in domestic matters, as better qualified to direct them to the good and satisfaction of their citizens than a general government so distant from its remoter citizens and so little familiar with the local peculiarities of the different parts.

Again—

Our country is too large to have all its affairs directed by a single government. Public servants at such a distance, and from under the eye of their constituents, must from the circumstance of distance be unable to administer and overlook all the details necessary for the good government of the citizens; and the same circumstance, by rendering detection impossible to their constituents, will invite the public agents to corruption, plunder, and waste.

Again—

It is not by the consolidation or centralization of powers, but by their distribution that good government is affected. Were not this great country already divided into States, that division must be made that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly and what it can so much better do than a distant authority.

Again—

When all government, domestic and foreign, in little as in great things, shall be drawn to Washington as the center of all power, it will render powerless the checks provided of one government on another and will become as venal and oppressive as the government from which we separated.

Again—

I was in Europe when the Constitution was planned, and never saw it until after it was established. On receiving it I wrote to Mr. Madison urging the want of provision for the freedom of religion, freedom of the press, trial by jury, habeas corpus, a substitution of militia for a standing army, and an express reservation to the State of all rights not specifically granted to the Union. He accordingly moved, in the first session of Congress, for these amendments, which were agreed to and ratified by the States as they now stand.

I wish to preserve (in a new constitution for Virginia) the line drawn by the Federal Constitution between the general and particular governments as it stands at present, and to take every prudent means of preventing either from stepping over it.

It was on this very subject that differences caused the first division of our people into political parties. It was adherence to the views and principles of Mr. Jefferson on this subject that constituted the fundamental doctrine of the Democratic Party, and if there is any doctrine, any principle to which the Democratic Party is committed, it is that the States alone have and that the States alone should have the powers of government over commerce within the States; the regulation of the civil rights of the people, including the right of suffrage, police regulations, and all other domestic affairs; and that the exclusive powers of the States to govern themselves in these matters should be maintained unabridged.

There may be some who believe this division of powers between the State and the Federal Governments and the limitation upon the powers of the latter were destroyed by the War between the States; but they are in error. The war was not fought for the destruction of the rights of the States, but for the preservation of the Union; and while war measures were taken which resulted in depriving the States of their right to determine some questions over which dissensions had arisen resulting in the war, and while the right of States to secede was denied by the arbitrament of arms, the other reserved rights of the States and limitations upon the powers of the Federal Government were saved.

This very doctrine saved the Southern States from negro domination and from carpet-bag government after the war was over, from the force bill, and from the infamies the reconstructionists would have loaded upon us; and it is the wall of fire around us now that protects us now against those who, under the pretense that they are their "brothers' keepers," assert that they have the right to govern us and would force us to have whites and negroes attend the same schools and otherwise mingle on terms of social equality.

I am unwilling to destroy that wall of fire; I am unwilling to make any breach in it even in so good a cause as the war upon the liquor traffic, because each breach furnishes a precedent for the next. Even now we find the advocates of some proposed amendments which would contravene this doctrine, using the adoption of the amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by the people and that giving Congress power to levy an income tax, neither of which in the least conflicts with the doctrine, as precedents for the adoption of their proposed amendments which are in direct conflict with it.

While I favor prohibition of the liquor traffic, vote for prohibition in precinct, county, and State, and hope the time will come when the traffic will be prohibited in every State in the Union and am willing to do my part to bring about that "consummation devoutly to be wished," I am quite sure it is not necessary to adopt national prohibition in order that each State may free itself from the liquor traffic whenever it desires to do so, and that each State may do so whenever it desires, and I believe that the people of each State can best determine for themselves when it is best for them to adopt prohibition and whether it is best for them to do so, for the simple reason that they are better acquainted with their own conditions and needs and are entitled to determine for themselves.

I understand full well that the States have agreed in the Constitution that it may be amended in the manner prescribed therein, by two-thirds of each House of Congress voting in favor of the amendment, and the ratification of the same by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. But this does not prove that the prohibition and suffrage amendments would not contravene the doctrine that each State has and should retain the right to govern itself in such matters. An amendment providing for a consolidated, centralized government could be adopted in the same way, and the rights of the States to govern themselves absolutely done away with.

There are those who attempt to answer these objections with denunciation; who class as defenders of the liquor traffic those who believe the proposed prohibition amendment contravenes the doctrine of States' rights, because they are unable to answer otherwise. No man can truthfully accuse me of being a defender of the liquor traffic. I helped rid my town and county of the saloon before it became popular to be a prohibitionist, and I have done as much to promote the success of the cause of prohibition in my State as my limited ability would permit. Freely have I given my time and whatever talents I possess, but I have always been a Democrat, always believed in the doctrine of States' rights, and I shall not be induced to support propositions in plain violation of the fundamental principles of the Democratic Party by denunciation or otherwise.

I do not believe it necessary to give to the Federal Government any additional power to enable it to do for the cause of temperance and prohibition all that need be done by it to make that cause a success in every part of the country where it can be made a success by any kind of law.

Let the Federal Government exercise the powers of taxation and the power over interstate commerce it now has in support of the laws the States have adopted in restraint of the traffic; let it levy a prohibitory tax on those who engage in the traffic without license from the State and local authorities; let it take away from the brewers and distillers the tariff protection they enjoy under the difference in their favor between the tariff on imported liquors and the internal-revenue tax on domestic, and it will do all that need be done to enable each State to do for itself as much as can be done by law, and there will be no necessity for setting a precedent for the next proposition that may be made to wipe out State lines and centralize government at Washington.

It is said that the traffic is a national evil, a national crime, a national curse. In the same sense, so is immorality and every other vice that is prevalent in all the States.

It is said that it will take the power of the Federal Government to destroy the liquor traffic. The Federal Government already has all the authority necessary to the exercise of the power to destroy the liquor traffic whenever its exercise would be justified by conditions prevailing in the States. Time and again the Supreme Court of the United States has said that "the power to tax is the power to destroy." That very power has been used to destroy the opium traffic.

But the power to tax is not only the power to destroy; it is also the power to favor and protect. And, strange to say, many of our friends who are so anxious to destroy the liquor traffic have for years sat quietly by without protest while the power of the Federal Government to tax has been used to protect and enrich the liquor traffic instead of to destroy it.

The excess of the tariff tax on imported spirits over the internal-revenue tax on spirits made in the United States, which excess is $1.50 per gallon, amounts to $1.50 per gallon protection in favor of the American distiller, and enables the Whisky Trust to get about $180,000,000 more every year from the American consumers of whisky. And the excess of the tariff tax on imported beers and other fermented liquors over the internal-revenue tax on such liquors made in the United States, which excess is more than 40 cents per gallon on such liquors when imported in bottles and jugs and more than 19 cents per gallon on such liquors when imported otherwise, amounts to that much protection in favor of the American brewers and enables them to get about $300,000,000 more every year from the American consumers of beer.

It will thus be seen that the power of the Federal Government to tax has been and is being used to favor and protect the liquor traffic. For many years this policy of protection and favor has been going on. Instead of the power of taxation being used against the liquor traffic it has been used in its favor. I have introduced a bill (H. R. 4335) to correct this and to start the Government in the right direction, to take away from the liquor interests the protection they now derive from the differentials to which I have called attention. My bill would turn into the Treasury of the Government of the United States the several hundreds of millions of dollars that now flow into the tills of the liquor lords through the favoritism of the Government.

And yet there are those who recklessly class me as a defender of the liquor traffic because I am unwilling to abandon the fundamental teachings and principles of the Democratic Party to help them set a precedent that will enable the centralizationists to follow with force bills and measures interfering with our elections and otherwise meddling with domestic affairs.

I am unwilling to surrender the doctrine that has enabled us to maintain white supremacy in the South or to help set a precedent that may be used against us when we invoke that doctrine in our defense in the future.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, there has come to my attention a matter connected with our Consular Service of which I think Congress should take notice.

I am informed that an American citizen living in China died leaving a large estate. The United States consul general at Shanghai took jurisdiction, marshaled the estate, and distributed the proceeds.

There are charges made that the consul made no accounting of a large part of the estate, and distributed such portion as he did distribute according to the terms of a will which was alleged to be forged, all of which was done without warrant of law, as there is no law authorizing a consul to distribute the estate of a decedent, and there appears to be no remedy for an American citizen defrauded by such usurpation, and I take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the Foreign Affairs Committee the need for a statute determining what the consular powers are regarding the estates of decedents.

There is another matter to which I wish to call attention.

It is not inferior in importance to any question which has been or will be considered by this Congress.

It has been more widely investigated and the committees of the House and Senate have given more time and effort to its study than perhaps all other questions before Congress.

I refer to "agricultural credits," or "farm loans." I sincerely regret that the Democratic caucus has decided not to enact a measure of this kind at this session.

There is no measure more urgently needed. We are promised a great bumper crop this year. The farmers will need help to harvest and market this crop. They have been led to expect this help. It is legislation of a type that every nation except our own has long since enacted.

A failure to enact remedial legislation, after all the promises, will be a disappointment that will surely be reflected in the agricultural vote in the next elections, that will prove anything but satisfactory to the party responsible for the denial of a very general demand of our people.

I beg the attention of the House while I make some observations upon this most important subject, which I hope may induce the House to review and reverse the decision of the Democratic Party so improvidently made.

The stage of academic discussion of the merits of agricultural cooperation and farm loans has long since been passed.

Every doubt has been resolved; theory has been translated into practice; it has been practically demonstrated in every civilized country save our own that systems of credit by which farmers may obtain loans at a low rate of interest not only aid a worthy and the most numerous class of citizens, but powerfully promote the welfare of all other classes.

It would seem strange in the light of what other countries have proved by years of experience, in the light of the great benefactions these systems of "farm loans" have brought to their people, that this country should have so long neglected to adopt similar policies.

IS GOVERNMENTAL AID TO FARMERS JUSTIFIABLE?

The arguments against the adoption of such policies naturally come from the "money lenders."

A half-baked editorial in the New York Herald opposes "cheap loans to the farmers unless the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker" are included in the "fool" scheme.

A moment's reflection reveals such sophomoric twaddle in all its silliness. But since this argument against "governmental aid to farmers" crops out in bankers' speeches and bankers' newspapers, and elsewhere in opposition, I propose to meet it face to face at the outset.

The argument that the "baker, the butcher, and the candlestick maker" have the same right to governmental aid as the farmer may be true, but they do not have the same need, and aid to them would not benefit the people and public as aid to agriculture will. As President Wilson says: "They do not stand on the same footing." The public welfare which is the only justification for giving either of them special consideration is deeply involved in the conditions of the farming class.

The urban worker is usually in receipt of wages, salary, or income from day to day or month to month by which he can gauge his outlay to his income. The building associations and the savings banks have gathered up his savings until they have reached an enormous sum. He is in a great creditor class. His subsistence comes from the labor of the farmer, and like all other classes he benefits from improved agricultural conditions.

But the farmer has no certain income. The reward for his year's labor comes from crops exposed to all the vicissitudes of weather and climate. And while every industry depends upon his industry, he is in a tremendously large debtor class burdened by exorbitant interest charges which "hobble" him and indirectly injure all other classes, and from which for this reason intelligent public policy seeks to relieve him.

The charge that this is "class legislation" will not bear analysis. The fact that all beneficial legislation benefits some individuals or class of individuals specially, is in no sense "class legislation" if the enactments promote the public welfare. Indeed, it may be admitted that any legislation that promotes the welfare of all classes inevitably will be of special benefit to some individuals. Whether it be river improvements, public roads and buildings, protective tariffs or revenue-only tariffs, parcel-post, or other similar legislation, somebody always especially benefits.

Legislation that benefits a class at the expense of the public is class legislation, iniquitous, and indefensible.

Legislation that benefits a class at no expense to the public may be in the "twilight zone," but I regard it as dangerous and always to be avoided.

But legislation that benefits a class at no expense to the Government and promotes the welfare of all classes is not class legislation at all, but lies properly and justly within the sphere of intelligent statesmanship.

The $450,000,000 expended by the Government on the Panama Canal will surely be of special benefit to some classes. There is no guaranty that the money will ever be returned.

And a farm loan properly secured, to be certainly repaid with reasonable interest, for a purpose discerned to be of great public benefit, is not a gift; it is not class legislation, not an advantage given to a class because they are farmers, but a simple business engagement entered into by the people, the Government, in the belief that it will benefit the whole people, and is wholly as just and proper as pensions or appropriations to war or naval or other colleges, though every man is not entitled to a pension nor can every boy attend college.

I agree that the Government may justly extend aid or dispense its bounty to an industry only when it is made accessible to all citizens in that industry upon equal terms, and not then unless such dispensation will clearly promote the general welfare. The crucial question must always be, "Does it promote the general welfare?"

The donations of about 158,000,000 of acres of the public domain to railroad companies were held to be justifiable on the ground that the public welfare would be promoted by the building of the railroads. And although those donations were usually improvident, and the methods by which special interests secured them were generally scandalous and corrupt, yet the railroads were of great public benefit.

The Government grants monopolies of inventions to patentees, who as a class benefit by the special privilege, but the grant is justified purely on the ground that in the end the public welfare is promoted.

For many years it has been the settled policy of the Government, and the greatly preponderating sentiment of the American people now is, to protect our industries from foreign competition by means of a tariff for no other reason than that in the end the public welfare is promoted. The general results have amply justified the policy of the protective tariff, although gross abuses devised by powerful beneficiaries have well-nigh destroyed the system in the public esteem.

The tariff law recently enacted protects industries and certain classes of producers and reduces or removes the protection from certain industries and classes of producers. Perhaps there was no deliberate intention to discriminate in favor of southern industries and southern products against other industries and products. Perhaps it was merely incidental that the goat's hair, rice, tobacco, and other southern products are protected, while wool, wheat, cattle, and other northern products are not protected. Let us assume that the apparent discriminations in favor of such industries as are carried on in the South are merely incidental; but to be entirely fair, the fact is that under any bill that possibly could be devised, even if there are sectional discriminations, in which the present tariff bill seems to abound, there were bound to be advantages to some classes not enjoyed by others, for which there would be perfect justification, provided the legislation promoted the general welfare of all classes.

The Government dispenses enormous sums for river and harbor improvements which nine-tenths of our citizens will never see and which are, incidentally, of great advantage to certain classes of citizens, but which are perfectly justified when they promote the public welfare.

The national banks for 50 years have enjoyed the use of an enormous sum of money, amounting now to $735,000,000, belonging to the Government, for which they pay one-half of 1 per cent. They buy Government bonds, then they deposit the bonds with the Government and get their money back in national-bank currency, and they lend this great sum to the people at the highest rate they can get. Meanwhile the Government pays them interest on the bonds.

This has been an enormous bounty to the money-lending class, but there has not been general complaint, for the reason that the people have been made to think that the strength and stability thereby given to our financial system promoted the public welfare, although, in my humble opinion, the issue of national-bank currency might quite as well have been "greenbacks," saving to the Government the enormous sum paid the banks as interest on the bonds lodged as security.

A short time ago the Secretary of the Treasury announced that he would lend to the banks $150,000,000 at 2 per cent interest, which they could lend to the people at what they could exact. The banks let a "yelp" out of them because the Government exacted 2 per cent, but the transaction and this additional bounty to the banks was justified on the ground that the money was needed to move the crops, and would promote the public welfare.

Mr. Chairman, it is unnecessary to multiply proofs that it has been the settled policy of this Government—and I might say of all other Governments—to aid and assist internal development, to aid classes of business and classes of citizens, purely upon the ground that such aids would promote the public welfare, although certain classes would incidentally and especially benefit thereby.

IT IS STATESMANSHIP, NOT CHARITY.

If "agricultural credits" or "farm loans" were proposed as a mere charity, a dole to be paid out of the public crib to an industry, however large or however deserving, there would be no justification for it.

But if it is shown that governmental assistance to the agricultural classes will promote the welfare of all classes the objections to governmental aid are met, our case is made out, and it will only remain to determine upon the plan to be adopted.

THE DRIFT TO THE CITY.

The drift from the farm to the city and the shops may be attributed to one cause or another, but the big reason is that the city has more attractions, bigger pay, more "soft snaps," and fewer "blisters."

The cold facts revealed by the census tell the story.

From 1900 to 1910 the increase of population in the United States was 21 per cent. The increase in cities and towns of 2,500 population and over was 35 per cent; the increase in rural population, 11 per cent.

That is to say, about half the normal increase in the rural sections moved to the city and raised the increase there to about three times the rural rate of increase.

Complaint is made of the hard conditions of life in the city among the working classes, but labor always goes where it is best paid, and when the boy leaves the farm for the city it simply proves that whatever the conditions are in the city they are harder still on the farm.

We used to boast that America could feed the world. Now we are fetching beef from Argentina and Australia, eggs from Japan, and breadstuffs from Canada, and we are pointed to a day in the near future when we will import largely farm products which heretofore we have raised at home.

As a matter of public policy of the greatest importance this condition should be changed.

WHAT HAS BEEN DONE ABROAD.

Germany was confronted with the same conditions. Forty per cent of all she ate was imported. Her farms were run down. Her agricultural classes were poor and distressed. Her statesmen, like our own, could offer no remedy. It remained for a couple of private citizens to organize systems of relief that were so successful in a small way that widespread attention was drawn to them. Philanthropists, bankers, statesmen, but most of all the farmers themselves, have developed systems of farm credits that have practically revolutionized German agriculture; and Germany, with her 66,000,000 of people in a country less in size than the State of Texas, with a rapidity of increase in her industrial developments that quite outstrips that of the United States, is to-day raising within her own borders 95 per cent of her breadstuffs.

But it is not in Germany only. France, Austria, Italy, Russia, Australia, wherever systematic effort has been applied to aid agriculture, the same results, differing in degree only, have been realized.

Statesmen the world over recognize that all industries, all human activities, are absolutely dependent upon agriculture. They see there can be no real national prosperity unless agriculture is in a prosperous condition. The efforts to improve agricultural conditions which have engaged their thought in Europe for the last 60 years are in nowise altruistic. They proceeded not for love of the farmer particularly, but from an enlightened selfishness, clearly discerning that prosperous agriculture is the enduring basis upon which all other industries must rest. As statesmen, knowing that "credit" is the very lifeblood of industry, they perceived that agriculture was handicapped, as banking as it was carried on in commercial circles did not and could not accommodate itself to farmers' needs.

They perceived that a different sort of banking was required for agricultural needs.

That is as true here as in Europe, and our statesmen are late in setting about the establishment of a system of banking that will serve the farmers.

It has been objected that farmers nowadays ride in automobiles and need no help; that they are prosperous and more able to lend to the Government than the Government is able to lend to them.

Let me, then, even though it be a repetition of what others have more cogently stated, show some facts regarding the condition of the farmer in this country.

WHY THE FARMER LEAVES THE FARM.

There are about 6,600,000 farms in the United States. The farmer, his family, and helpers working on the farm number about 31,000,000 and constitute about one-third of the entire population. The rural population, as shown by the census of 1910—that is, the people living outside of towns having 2,500 residents and over—number 49,348,000, or 54 per cent of the total population.

According to the census report of 1910, there are—

	Acres.
Of arable lands in crops	311,000,000
Of improved lands not in crops	167,451,000
Woodland in farms	190,865,000
Untilled land in farms	209,482,000
Land not in farms:
Tillable	261,202,000
Nontillable, but valued for pasture and orchards	361,000,000
Useless for agriculture	402,289,000
Total area of the United States	1,903,289,000

It will be observed that the farms averaged 138 acres in size, of which 75 acres were under cultivation and 63 acres were uncultivated. Roughly speaking, only 1 acre out of every 4 of tillable land is tilled.

The farmer as a class is the most thoughtful, most careful, industrious, hard working, independent, and dependable of all classes of our people.

His farms, buildings, stock, and machinery are worth upward of $41,000,000,000.

On this property he raises annually $9,750,000,000 worth of products, valued at the farm. Of this amount, the "crops" are of the value of $6,100,000,000 and the animal products are of the value of $3,650,000,000.

If from this gross product is deducted the value of products consumed on the farm the cash sales from the farms of crops and animal products for 1913 are estimated at $5,847,000,000.

Now, since there are about 6,600,000 farms in the United States, the average cash income per farm, which averages about 138 acres, is about $886; deduct average cost of fertilizers per farm, $18; employed help, $102; maintenance of implements and buildings, $89; feed purchased, $47; taxes, $39; miscellaneous expenses, $44; which leaves of cash income about $547 per farm.

The farmers owe an enormous sum, variously estimated from $6,500,000,000 to $8,000,000,000, and pay an average rate the country over of 7¼ per cent interest, amounting to $510,000,000, not counting lawyers' fees, recording, and commissions, or about one-tenth of his annual product, or about equal in value to the entire wheat crop of the country, or a rate which would kill the Steel Trust or Standard Oil, and which makes a charge of $77 per farm. This leaves his net income about $470.

Considering that the investment in land, tools, and buildings on the average farm is $6,443, and that for his labor and the labor of his wife and children and his "investment" the farmer annually gets his "grub" and $470, it is not hard to understand why the farmer boy drifts to the city. And if you allow him 5 per cent on his investment he would have $153 for his labor. The wonder grows that he stays on the farm at all.

A recent bulletin of the Agricultural Department, given out February 7, 1914, gives the result of investigations made in the "corn belt" in Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, chosen because these districts "excel all other regions in wealth of farm products" and where the system of agriculture is "unequaled," in which it is stated that the average labor income of farm owners operating their own farms was $408, and "they had in addition a house to live in and those products which the farm furnished toward their living."

Now, if this is true of farming in the very richest part of America, what think you is the "labor income" of the average farmer, and the average man is the man whose circumstances are of public concern?

The census reports of farm mortgages is incomplete. The number of farms in 1910 was 6,361,502, but the mortgages were only computed for 3,948,722 farms, of which 1,327,439 farms are reported as mortgaged; and the amount of mortgages are only reported on 1,006,511 farms, on which the mortgage debt was $1,726,173,000, or an average of $1,715 per farm. If the same proportion of all the farms were mortgaged at the same rate, the mortgages would amount to about $4,000,000,000, or one-tenth of the value of lands and buildings.

But since the amount of mortgages on some farms were not reported, the real amount of the farm mortgages can only be guessed at, but would hardly be less than $5,000,000,000. This is in addition to whatever the farmer owes which is not secured by mortgage, and which would probably bring the total indebtedness up to $6,500,000,000.

THESE ARE STAGGERING FIGURES.

It is significant that of the farms reported the mortgage debt was 27 per cent of the reported value of the farms, and that in 20 years farm mortgages have increased in amount 40 per cent.

Farm property has increased enormously in value. From 1900 to 1910 the value of farm property increased from $20,500,000,000 to $41,000,000,000, or just double what it was in 1900; but from 1890 to 1910 the number of mortgaged farms increased 440,442 and the average mortgage per farm increased from $1,224 to $1,715.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. HULINGS. Certainly.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Does the gentleman offer any remedy or policy to prevent or to obviate the tendency of young men to go from the farm to the city?

Mr. HULINGS. I hope I shall be able to later on.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HULINGS. I shall do so further on.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. HULINGS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman was speaking a moment ago about the increase of farm mortgages. My attention was diverted for the moment, and I did not catch what the gentleman said. Will he kindly repeat that statement?

Mr. HULINGS. I said the average increase per farm was from $1,224 to $1,715.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Between what years?

Mr. HULINGS. From 1890 to 1910. This proves that the farmers' prosperity very largely consists in the rise in the price of land, and that it is not in "working the farm" that he realizes profits, but to realize his prosperity he must sell his land. In other words, the farmer who did not farm is about as prosperous as the farmer who farmed, as the rise in value of farm lands came to both.

These facts, gleaned from the census reports, disclose that he is a tremendous borrower. They show that farming is loaded up with a burden and an interest charge that would ruin any other industry.

FARMING AND BANKING.

There are other features not disclosed by the census. It may be stated that business in a large way is impossible without the aid of commercial credits, furnished usually through the instrumentality of the banks.

But the farmer, whose only assets are real estate, finds commercial banking closed to him for a number of reasons. A farm mortgage is not such a liquid security as a bank desires; and if it were, "short-time" loans do not meet the necessities of the farmer, who must cover the time from planting until sale of crops; and no bank will lend on 9 or 12 months' time as long as it can lend on 3 or 4 months' paper.

The doors of the national bank have been closed by law to the borrower on real estate; and though the new currency bill admits him to the bank, he will never get a loan until no one else wants the money on short-time loans. This provision of the new currency law is a "tub thrown to the whale," and will help the farmer very little.

And so the farmer is driven to the private lender, as a rule, or to the State banks, and when he finds a lender he is obliged to hire a lawyer to search his title, to prepare the mortgage, and when the interest, the lawyer, the notary, and the recorder are paid he discovers that his loan has cost him not 5 per cent or 8 per cent but, if the sum borrowed be a small one on short time, more likely 15 to 20 per cent.

Commercial banking brings him as a borrower in competition with the short-term borrower. The merchant who borrows $1,000 will turn it, perhaps, four times a year, at a profit of 5 per cent for each turn, or $200. Deducting the interest, he has left as his net profit $140. But the farmer turns his money but once a year, and if he makes even 12 per cent on the turn the interest charge eats it all. One of the reasons why the farmer and his boys are drifting to the city is that under our present system he is denied access to credit such as is essential to other branches of industry, or he is required to pay ruinous rates, and he goes to the city because he can not stay on the farm.

THE WELFARE OF EVERY CLASS DEPENDS UPON THE LABOR OF THE FARMER.

But it is not the farmer as a class, worthy and large as it is, that should claim first consideration. The welfare of every class and the needs of the whole Nation depend upon his prosperity, and action is imperative.

That a remedy should be provided is admitted by all thoughtful persons.

The important matter now is, What shall the remedy be?

Experience abroad has been considered, and various remedies are proposed in bills already presented to this Congress.

With one exception they all follow one or the other of the German systems, with modifications.

THE LANDSCHAFTEN SYSTEM.

The Landschaften system was introduced by that great soldier and statesman, Frederick the Great, in 1769, when little Prussia had fought all Europe to a standstill and was herself impoverished, and her fields, sodden with blood, were idle and unproductive. By this system the farms of a community are mortgaged to an association of borrowers; the association issues bonds based on the collective security of all the mortgages. The association in some cases receives Government aid in various forms and issues to the mortgagor the bonds of the association, which he sells in the open market or secures advances upon them. In this way long-term loans are secured, which are extinguished by annual payments equal to 4½ to 5 per cent of the sum borrowed, and great benefits are derived, but will scarcely, I think, ever be favorably received by our people, for it has the fatal objection that it requires one man to make his property liable for another man's debts, and has other objectionable features.

THE REIFFEISEN SYSTEM.

The Reiffeisen system of short-time loans was first introduced in 1848, in a small way. For 20 years it made little headway, but gradually improved and established itself as a great and benign institution. There are about 17,000 local branches in operation in Germany, and they have proved of wonderful benefit to agriculture there. It is practically a system of small local banks of peasant proprietors, receiving deposits from members and the public, paying interest, obtaining funds, and, from savings deposits and the price of the shares paid in by the members and from the bank's obligations, lending to members only on short-time loans, usually all operations being secured by the full or limited liability of each member for any obligation of the bank. There is involved also the machinery of central banks, Government control and inspection.

These local banks are cheaply operated, the average expense being $153 per year, and are confederated in central banks, which receive loans from the Government. Various modifications of the Reiffeisen system are in operation in Germany, numbering altogether over 24,000 banks, the effect of which is shown in the wonderful activity and success, not only on the German farm, but in German manufactures as well.

THE CREDIT FONCIER SYSTEM.

The Credit Foncier system of France differs practically only in the fact that patronage and cash contributions of the Government are enjoyed by the central organization, which has a lottery feature to promote the sale of its bonds, and the profits of the business are distributed as private gains to its members.

OBJECTIONS TO THESE PLANS.

None of these plans are compatible with the American conditions and train of thought.

The European farmer dwells in villages where the social conditions differ greatly from American conditions, where the people are widely separated, each on his own farm. Many of the "farms" are but 30 feet wide and 300 feet long. Ten to 15 acres is quite a "farm." Intensive farming and "handwork" are carried on to an extent unknown to us. The habits of life are greatly different. In this regard the recent report of the Agricultural Department already referred to—bulletin 41—makes these significant statements:

> The American type of farming needs large areas in contrast to the European type.
> Modern machinery has made the small farm an inefficient unit.
> If the small farm has a place, it must be near a city.
> The old hand-labor methods still common in Europe are suited only to small areas. If these methods prevailed here, our agricultural civilization would gravitate toward the peasant conditions existing in some parts of Europe.

The women do most of the work, at a wage of $3 per month, with board and lodging. There is little need for money where men work for 50 cents and women for 20 cents per day. A great proportion of the loans under this system is less than $20. The American farmer needs to employ machinery, requiring a great deal more money in his operations.

This all shows that European systems of agricultural credits, however adaptable to conditions there, would find here utterly different conditions. The American idea is bigger and broader. He is not accustomed to do business with a "teaspoon."

I gravely doubt whether any system can be transplanted from European practice that will work in American soil without modification that will make it practically another system.

THE REMEDY MUST PRESERVE PERSONAL INITIATIVE.

The remedy should not be sought in any plan which involves governmental or political or expensive and complicated machinery or makes the man merely a cog in a social cooperative machine.

Plans thus far offered by the distinguished gentlemen who have labored upon this subject involve the organization of a multitude of local organizations either under State or Federal authority, or both; a multitude of central organizations, pyramided upon which is a national control. Within these constructions is the imperative employment of an army of clerks, bookkeepers, salaried officials; the expenses of banking paraphernalia; rents; plate glass; burglar-safe vaults, and so forth; and the farmer foots the bill.

POLITICAL INFLUENCE MUST BE AVOIDED.

But vastly more objectionable than all this is the danger that it will build up a great political machine or put in the hands of the political party that for the time is in control a powerful "pull," reaching down through the central banks to its officers, agents, and employees, down through the local banks to the farmers upon the land, with all the coercion and cajolery of "banker's influence," and none need be told what that means.

This objection is not so powerful in a monarchial government, but in a republican form of government I regard it as insuperable.

Nor will the public fail to appreciate this danger. A case in point is furnished in the State of Pennsylvania. A constitutional amendment was required to authorize a proposed issue of $50,000,000 of bonds to be expended in road improvements, and the voters decided the question at the November election. Now practically everybody in Pennsylvania, as in all other intelligent communities, is in favor of good roads, and it was generally conceded that a bond issue which would permit the rapid building of the roads and give the people immediate use of them, at the same time spreading the cost over a term of years so that future users of the roads may help pay for them, is a sensible, businesslike plan.

But just here came in an objection which upset a plan that met general approval.

The people were afraid of the political machine that could, and undoubtedly would, be built on this bond issue. The people had no faith in the administration in Pennsylvania.

The Republican Party organization holds the governor in the hollow of its hands.

The superintendent of public highways was believed to be grossly extravagant if not corrupt. With $50,000,000 to dispense, the "Penrose organization" would be hard to unhorse. And so in the fear that a corrupt and unscrupulous political machine would control, the people defeated a measure that otherwise they favored.

There is, however, no need to run any risks of this kind.

AN AMERICAN PLAN.

There has been in this country a practical demonstration of a system which, with some adaptation, can be applied to farm loans with great success.

I refer to the wonderful development in this country of the building and loan associations.

There are, I am informed, 6,300 building and loan societies in the United States, with 2,500,000 members and $1,137,000,000 invested in mortgages, and the administration expenses are less than three-fourths of 1 per cent of the receipts.

These organizations exist, I believe, in every State of the Union except Vermont, varying somewhat in methods of management in order to make the system flexible and adapted to the particular needs of the community served.

They are naturally doing their work in the cities for reasons that I shall refer to later.

There is one particular, however, that I would call especial attention to, and that is that when it has been attempted to confederate these local societies into national associations the result has been failure.

Every society is local and independent, without a retinue of salaried officials, without political bias or control or overseers or inspectors, each society meeting one evening in a month at trifling cost, transacts its business, makes its rules, absolutely controls its own business, and accomplishes a purpose that has been of inestimable advantage to its members and to the general public as well. Our people are familiar with it.

THE PROPOSED PLAN IS AMERICAN.

It is an American plan, worked out to suit American conditions—simple, cheap, and efficient in operation.

Efforts are being made in many of the States to adopt the building and loan plan to farm loans, notably in Ohio, Indiana, Wisconsin, and New York.

The difficulty is that while urban borrowers, paying monthly dues out of monthly wages, can quickly accumulate loanable funds, unlike him, the farmer needs the help most while he is waiting for his crop, and when he has no income from which to pay dues, and therefore the ordinary building and loan company doing business in a needy farming community would have to go afar to find loanable funds, and would have to pay attractive commercial rates of interest on the loan, on top of which would be the administration expenses.

The Hirsch Foundation and the societies growing out of it, the Jewish farmers' cooperative credit unions and the Jewish agricultural and industrial aid societies, have been in operation for more than 20 years. These societies have made loans to 2,500 Jewish farmers, aggregating $1,800,000. The credit unions, 17 in number, are a new offshoot, first organized in 1911.

But all of these—and I venture to say all of the building and loan societies—seeking to operate in farm communities will encounter the difficulty of accumulating the funds to start with, and will be obliged to go outside and pay commercial rates, which will defeat the aim to secure low rates.

The plan which I propose is an adaptation of the building and loan plan to farm loans, in which this difficulty is overcome.

This bill has been printed and is known as H. R. 9988.

In some of its details it may require amendment. Its general features may be described as follows:

Any number of practical farmers, not less than 25, within a given radius from the chosen place of business may organize a Federal corporation with a capital stock of not less than $25,000 in manner following closely the method of organizing national banks. Subscribers are required to give their notes, secured by mortgage upon farm lands that for three years preceding have been assessed for taxation at double the amount of the mortgage, payable to a trustee, for use of the United States, with such rate of interest as the association may prescribe.

The association then makes its note payable to the Treasurer of the United States for the amount of its capital stock for the term of 25 years, with 3 per cent interest, with amortized payments that will, after the second year, gradually discharge the principal debt; and as a security therefor, attaches the individual notes and mortgages of the subscribers, together with a satisfactory bond of the trustee and policies of insurance of the titles by approved title-insurance companies.

If upon investigation the proceedings are found to be correct and the securities satisfactory, the Secretary of the Treasury issues to the association, out of the funds not otherwise appropriated or from the proceeds of 3 per cent United States bonds that are authorized to be sold for the purpose, Treasury notes to the amount of the capital stock of the association, and places in the hands of the trustee the individual notes and mortgages for collection and, in addition, charges him with the prevention of waste or other diminution of the securities.

The association distributes this fund among its shareholders in proportion as they have contributed the securities.

THE HAUNTING FEAR OF FORECLOSURE.

So long as the shareholder pays the rate of interest agreed upon—which presumably will be 3 per cent semiannually—foreclosure, the haunting fear of the farmer who goes into debt, has no terrors for him. He is assured that if the stipulated interest is paid to the end of the term he will be free from debt, and every dollar paid above 3 per cent and the cost of administration discharges a part of his debt.

Of course, "one can not make a wig without hair." If the Government is repaid with 3 per cent interest, the amount required annually in amortized payments to discharge the debt is a simple question of mathematics. The longer the term the smaller is the sum required each year, and of course to this sum must be added the administration expenses, which, for a small association not meeting oftener than twice a year, should be much less than for the ordinary building and loan association, which meets monthly, and should not exceed $250 per annum.

PROVISION FOR SHORT-TIME LOANS.

My proposition includes also the plan of requiring a cash subscription of 10 per cent, which would defray preliminary expenses and serve as a fund from which small loans could be made to meet the temporary wants of the members. This provision, coupled with the plan of paying no part of the principal for two years, and then gradually increasing the amortized payments to a sufficient sum to repay the Government within the term, would result in the gradual increase of a fund from which "short loans" could be made. Each association can also provide that members or nonmembers may deposit savings which can be loaned to short-term borrowers working out a scheme on the same general plan of building and loan companies without in any manner involving the Government or affecting its security.

Many of the details embraced in the bill may doubtless be improved.

The plan provides a term for the "association" of 25 years, for the plain reason that the longer the term the smaller the required annual payment will be.

The stipulations of repayment to the Government are provided as follows:

Three per cent of sum borrowed for 2 years.
Five per cent of sum borrowed for 3 years.
Six per cent of sum borrowed for 10 years.
Seven per cent of sum borrowed for 10 years.
This is an average of 6.04 per cent.

On this basis, upon the assumption that the members of the association will pay the association 3 per cent semiannually on their individual notes during the term, their debt would be extinguished, and over and above the administration expenses there would be accumulated in the treasury of the association a surplus to cover possible contingencies.

HOW THE PLAN WILL WORK.

Worked out on the assumed plan that 10 per cent were originally paid in cash for preliminary expenses and capital, and that a loan for $25,000 should be secured from the Government, and the administration expense should not exceed $250 a year—which should be sufficient for a small neighborhood concern—the following would be the results:

The total cost to the shareholders would be		$45,912
Less surplus at end of term	$2,231
Less cash received from Government	25,000
		$27,231
Net cost of loan to shareholders		$18,681
Net cost of loan annually		$747
Average annual amount of loans to stockholders		$28,955
Rate of interest paid resultant from compounded accretions—per cent		2.58

That is, 3 per cent paid semiannually for 25 years will pay the principal and 3 per cent interest plus the assumed administration expenses and accumulate besides a sum sufficient to reduce the actual cost of the loans to a 2.58 per cent rate.

The cost of a loan under this plan as compared with a straight 6 per cent loan is apparent:

Interest on $28,955, at 6 per cent for 25 years		$43,432.50
Principal that must be repaid		28,955.00
Amount of principal and simple interest		72,387.50
Cost of same by this plan	$45,912
Difference in favor of this plan		28,706.50

If it be objected that many borrowers may not favor mortgaging their property for such a long period, the answer is that provision can be easily made for the withdrawal of his security and the substitution of another borrower, or in case there are none, that his mortgage and note can be surrendered to him upon payment of the remaining unpaid sum. And since the longer he stays in, the greater will be the advantage to him, each society will doubtless prepare tables showing the "book value" of shares so as to show members just what they will have to pay at any time to enable them to withdraw.

Many of such details have been practically worked out in building and loan associations, and can be easily adapted to farm loans.

It will be observed that while the capital derived from the Government is but $25,000, the average loans by the society are $28,955. This excess of $3,955 is the accumulations of the difference between the interest paid by shareholders and the amortized payments paid to the Government and the compounding thereof, and constitutes a fund to which the members may have recourse for such "short-time" accommodations as a little circle of farmers might require in addition to their "long-time" loans; or it could be loaned to nonmembers who could give proper security.

WHAT IT COSTS.

But in any case the farmer would be getting his loan at the dead cost of the amount paid the Government plus his share of the administration expenses. There would be no expensive officers or offices, rents, mahogany desks, and so forth, to keep up. The entire business would confine itself to the community where every member knows the character and responsibility of every other member. The sole concern of the Government would be that its bonded officer serving as he would in most cases and as they invariably do in the Reiffeisen system without salary, living amongst the borrowers and acquainted with their circumstances shall collect the semiannual interest on the individual notes and remit to the Government the amortized payments as they fall due and turn the residue over to the association.

COOPERATIVE FEATURES.

Such associations will naturally become the agencies, and an important part of the plan is, although it is optional with each society, that it shall become an agency for the purchase of fertilizers and farmers' supplies at wholesale, distributing them at cost to members, and for other approved cooperative methods.

The "association" would have legal authority to receive deposits either as stipulated payments of dues upon shares or as voluntary deposits of savings. These deposits would increase the fund from which members could be accommodated with "short-time" loans, or would provide for the establishment of agencies for cooperative purchases, distributions, and marketing.

This branch of operations could be carried on after the fashion of building and loan society operations promoting savings deposits and requiring none of the paraphernalia of banking business, and the Government would be in no wise concerned, for whether such operations were successful or failures the Government security would be unimpaired.

This feature would embrace all the advantages and furnish all the inducements to savings and thrift that the building and loan societies offer to their members precisely to the extent that farmers who require capital would find it possible to contribute to a savings fund.

And I wish to observe that just to the extent that the farmers would not or could not contribute to a savings fund that could be loaned out to short-term borrowers, precisely to the same extent would all these projects that contemplate the organization of "banks" with capital contributed by the farmer fail.

Any system of "banking" predicated upon bonds issued by a bank and secured by farm mortgages and depending on the finding of purchasers of the bonds amongst the "lenders of money for hire" will surely develop in its management cupidity, selfishness, and an interest rate and an array of discounts, commissions, salaries, and expenses which the mortgagors will have to meet.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] is talking about the most important subject that is pending before the House—the question of rural credits—and unless that question is taken up at this session of Congress we shall have to have a quorum present to do business. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will not the gentleman withhold that point until the gentleman from Pennsylvania finishes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

The committee rose; and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FINLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15762, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, and finding itself without a quorum had caused the roll to be called, and 246 Members had answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] is recognized.

Mr. HULINGS. Sir, I am inclined to think that any system that requires the farmer to depend upon money lenders in the open market or in the broker's office or that involves the employment of an army of overseers and inspectors will not furnish the relief sought.

If this bill were enacted it would cost the Government not one penny. If it would not work, nobody would be out a dollar and nobody would be into an office.

CROPS AND PRICES.

Paradoxical as it may seem, an increase of farm products does not necessarily imply an increase in farm revenues; in fact, it often means less.

"Making two blades of grass grow where one grew before" is an expression of economic poesy, but in cold fact neither insures more revenue to the producer nor less cost to the consumer.

Bigger crops may and frequently do mean less revenue. The problem can not be solved by a "jump in the dark."

Of course while it is true that a larger crop may bring less money than a smaller one, as the facts frequently prove, yet it is plain that if the farmer can secure cooperative methods, can reduce interest charges, and at the same time increase his crops by better farming, and if on top of this he adopts better and more economic methods of marketing, he can sell at far less prices and make more money, and right here is where the public welfare is served.

"Marketing" and the "middleman" are involved. The farmer sells in the wholesale market and buys at retail. The middleman takes a "hack" at him going and coming. The farmer gets but 40 or 50 cents out of the dollar involved.

COOPERATIVE PURCHASES AND MARKETING ESSENTIAL.

The system that will solve the problem must not only furnish the farmer with tools to work with; that is, available credit, but it must naturally and easily engage him in cooperative agencies for the supply of farm purchases at wholesale and for the distribution and marketing of his products.

Such a system will make farm life easier and more profitable and lower the cost of living to the consumer.

These results can be obtained under the methods I propose.

Mark well this feature of my plan: From the time the loans leave the Government Treasury until they reach the farmer, THERE IS NO PLACE FOR ANY OF THEM TO STICK, THERE ARE NO PALMS TO BE GREASED, NO MACHINERY TO BE OILED, AND NOTHING TO GET OUT OF GEAR.

THE CHIEF FEATURE.

The simplicity of the plan is apparent, but simplicity is not the chief feature. The chief feature is the prompt application of the remedy precisely to the places where needed. It gives the farmer funds to work with on terms he can meet, without cumbersome and expensive machinery, while promoting and encouraging savings and cooperative methods.

SOME OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED.

The objection has been raised that the Government should not engage in banking; that the Government should not engage in business.

For years the express companies put up this cry. Very tardily the Government undertook the parcel-post business, although in a piecemeal and fragmentary sort of way. Out of a very tender regard for the express companies, the weight was fixed at 11 pounds, now raised to 50 for certain distances, and a scale of rates fixed at about double what they should be, but nevertheless the department is now doing business, greatly relieving the public from the extortions exacted by the express companies for many years.

The Post Office Department does a bigger business than any corporation in the United States—just carrying packages. The Government is already "doing business," and many people believe that the Government should do more business and take over the express business, and others think it should take over the telegraph and the telephone business, and wipe out these extortionate monopolies, as England and Germany have done.

And then the fact is that the Government already is in the "banking business," and has been for the last 50 years, at least to the extent this bill would put it into the banking business.

The national banks now hold $735,000,000 of money issued to them by the Government, for which they pay nothing save a tax of one-half of 1 per cent, and they made a big howl because the Government proposed to charge 2 per cent interest on additional deposits.

All the banks of the country, National and State, with a capital of $2,010,000,000, owe their depositors the colossal sum of $17,024,000,000. This they lend to borrowers, and derive great revenues from what they owe.

If the farmers were given a "snap" like that, the people would surely object, but the bankers are able to get away with it. He is a "long-headed" brother that can live on his debts and get rich.

The bankers, by putting up security, have obtained the use of this great sum of Government money for 50 years practically without cost. Under the new currency law the bankers can obtain Government money practically without limit on the security of the notes of Tom, Dick, and Harry, which may or not be good a fortnight hence.

It can not therefore be regarded as any great stretch of generosity if the farmer is loaned Government money, for which he pays 3 per cent interest and puts up as security approved mortgages on land, which can not run away. He need not feel that he is a subject of "charity," for no other class receiving Government aid ever paid 3 per cent interest or put up a sounder security for the return of the loan.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I would like to ask the gentleman if, considering the fact that Congress has just passed a bill to expend $35,000,000 for a railroad in Alaska, and $400,000,000 in building the Panama Canal, if he does not think it would be good economy to finance these banks and help out the farmer?

Mr. HULINGS. I am glad the gentleman asked the question, because it calls attention again to the central feature of the bill, and that is that the farmers to secure Government aid will put up good security, land that can not run away, approved after investigation, pay 3 per cent interest, and it is no great stretch of generosity to do that for them, because I have just shown that the Government has been issuing to the national banks alone $735,000,000 on which they pay but one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman is giving a very interesting and instructive speech. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The provisions of his bill, if I understand him correctly, require a security of twice the amount that the farmer can borrow; that is, it allows the farmer to borrow one-half of the assessed valuation of his farm, and the shareholder on an average must borrow $1,000; that is, there must be a capital stock of $25,000 and 25 shareholders in order to organize an association.

Mr. HULINGS. Not necessarily; there may be $50,000 and there may be $100,000 capital, though no association with less than 25 members or less than $25,000 can be formed. This, however, is a mere detail.

Mr. MAPES. The question I had in mind is, How are you going to help the man who has got $300 or $400 and a few farm implements and a team; how are you going to help him get money to buy a farm?

Mr. HULINGS. I think that could easily be accomplished. If he had $300 or $400 and teams and farming tools, if he had a neighbor that wanted to sell 50 or 100 acres of land, he could make an arrangement through him by which the land becomes security for the loan he secures to pay for the land.

Mr. MAPES. Does the bill allow anybody except a shareholder to borrow money from the association?

Mr. HULINGS. No.

THE SAFETY OF FARM MORTGAGES.

Another objection is that farm mortgages would not make the Government safe in issuing the loans.

Those who believe that "gold" is the only real security may be interested to learn that according to the Treasury report of September 24, 1913, the amount of gold in the Treasury was $1,284,000,000, while the indebtedness, including the outstanding bonds, was $2,987,000,000, or about 40 cents of gold for the dollar of obligations. Gold is as good a standard of value as any commodity can be, but the "wabbling" character of the gold standard will be recognized if we contemplate for a moment the effect of a general crop failure in the world or the sudden exhaustion or a rapid increase of the gold supply.

Compared with the enormous sum of about $168,000,000,000 of business done in the country annually through the clearing houses alone, the amount of gold in the country cuts a very small figure.

Upon what does the great volume of the business stand? Gold? No. Ninety-eight per cent is done on credit. What is the basis of the Government's power to float loans at 3 per cent interest? Credit. The faith and confidence that the Government will redeem any of her obligations that may be presented at any one time in gold, though everybody knows that there is not enough gold in the country, and never will be if all of her obligations were to be redeemed at any one time. It is the confidence in the power of the Government to procure gold when wanted.

Primarily the credit of the Government (for the Government is at all times in the debtor class) and her power to procure gold or pay her debts depends upon her unlimited power to tax the lands and the people upon the lands.

Thus in the final analysis the foundation of the gold supply, and the integrity of the Government, and her fiscal undertakings, and, indeed, of all business credits, is the land and the labor of the people upon the land.

For this reason selected farm mortgages, though they do not have the liquidity essential to commercial banking, are the soundest possible securities, and in the hands of the Government the quality of liquidity is unimportant.

Mr. Chairman, the more I have studied this great subject and the suggested systems of farm loans, the more I am convinced that the true course is along plain, simple lines with which our people are already familiarized by building and loan society operations, which shall be simple and inexpensive, beyond political influence and control, and where each association shall be separate and independent and free to address itself to the conditions in its own community, becoming, if its members choose, a cooperative society for purchasing farm supplies and marketing products; or if its members choose to operate as a savings society, yet in no wise involving the Government, or impairing the securities of the governmental loan by any operation which it may undertake.

Every other plan proposed that I am familiar with involves the expense of "banking houses" and of Government control, with an army of salaried officers and the inevitable building of a political machine.

If I understand the Moss or the Fletcher bill, it means the inevitable drift of the enormous volume of farm indebtedness into the control of the money-lending class. That class will organize the banks that will issue the bonds on the mortgages the farmers bring to them. The money must come from those who have it; and you may tell me that they will take no advantage, but I know human nature pretty well, and I see the risk; and, besides, it is an expensive and a roundabout, if not risky method, which is wholly avoidable and unnecessary.

The Government need not be concerned in anywise whatever, except that its bonded officer shall collect the interest as it falls due and see that no waste is committed.

The association dealing with its own members should not be a subject of Government espionage or inspection. It is not in its power to injure the Government. The repayment of the loan or the security for the loan are not derived from, or in any way affected by, any business the association may do.

Professional banking with its expenses, Government control with its salaried officials and enormous expense, which are involved by the bill considered by the committee, can be avoided by a proper bill.

Such a bill, in my opinion, is H. R. 9988, and I offer it in the hope that it may be given earnest consideration.

In making this contribution to the thought that is given to a subject of such high importance, I indulge no great pride of opinion. I have given it many months of study, desiring only to reach rational and practical conclusions.

If a better plan is devised, I shall cheerfully and earnestly work for its enactment.

As representatives of the people, and intrusted with the mighty powers of legislation, we shall fail in our opportunity and fail in our duty if we do not adopt a carefully wrought-out plan of agricultural credits which the general welfare demands, and which will afford to the great farming class opportunities that if they do not compare with the advantages given by the Government to the banking class shall at least alleviate the hard conditions of farm life, since it can be done at no cost to the Government.

We bemoan the fact that the boys are "leaving the farm." Well, then, let us make it possible for them to stay on the farm. Let us give them the tools to work with, and the chiefest of these is "credit." If we can devise a fair system of "farm loans," it will be the best work done in a long day for the public welfare and the best thing ever done directly for the farmer's benefit.

The farmer seeks not sympathy nor charity. He is "toting" his load, asking no odds. But enlightened statesmanship, purely on the ground of the public welfare, has aided the farmer in other lands, and demonstrated the great benefits that will accrue to all classes of our citizens if we shall devise a proper system of farm loans.

The great question transcending all others in importance and embracing every class is involved; the efficiency of farm production, better roads, better country schools, and better methods of marketing farm products; and at the basis of these is a proper system of agricultural credits.

I can not conclude my remarks better than by quoting the words of President Wilson in his recent message to Congress, though unfortunately he has not sought to impress them upon the Democratic caucus:

> I present to you the urgent necessity that special provision be made for facilitating the credits needed by the farmers. * * *
> Our thoughts may ordinarily be concentrated upon the cities and the hives of industry, the crowded market places, and the clangor of factories, but it is from the quiet interspaces of the open valleys and the free hillsides we draw the sources of life and prosperity. * * * Without these every street would be silent, every office deserted, every factory fallen into disrepair.
> The farmer does not stand upon the same footing with the forester and the miner in the market of credit. * * * The security he gives is of the character not known in the broker's office. * * *
> * * * We lag behind many other great countries of the modern world in attempting to do this. Systems of rural credit have been studied and developed on the other side of the water, while we left our farmers to shift for themselves in the ordinary money market. * * *

[Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss the merits of this bill, but I do desire to discuss the condition of public business in this House. This House has been in almost continuous session for three years. In my judgment the membership of this House are entitled to great credit for earnest work and a desire to do their duty and for the work that they have performed in the interest of the American people. But I equally believe that this House is entitled to adjourn at a reasonable date this coming summer. [Applause.] The membership of this House are entitled to go home to present their views to their constituents in the coming elections. More than that, this country is looking for peace, not only peace on the American border, but industrial peace. [Applause.]

The people of the United States are not clamoring as much for legislation to-day as they are for an opportunity to do business. [Applause.] But there are some matters of importance before this House that ought to be transacted before the House adjourns, that the Congress ought to have an opportunity to vote upon before the adjournment is reached. If the membership of this House will do its duty, will maintain a quorum of the committee and a quorum of the House during the sessions of the House, and other Members will be reasonable, so far as their own personal ambitions are concerned and their own personal desires are concerned, and suppress them, we will be able to vote on the great public matters that are before us and reach an adjournment, in my opinion, early in July. [Applause.]

But we certainly can not accomplish it if the House intends to pursue the tactics that have been pursued in the last two days. In the first place, it is the duty of Members to maintain a quorum here. In the second place, it is the patriotic duty of every Member of this House not to throw any unreasonable obstructions in the way of the House doing business.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman mean that as a criticism of a Member who makes a point of no quorum?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think, in a way; yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I propose to see that a quorum is here to do business unless we pass a rural-credit bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the gentleman from Oklahoma is right about the rural-credit bill. The gentleman is not half as much in favor of a rural-credit bill as I am, because I have strenuously insisted and endeavored to have a rural-credit bill presented to this House; but I say that the policy the gentleman is pursuing in his efforts to get a rural-credit bill is not a credit to him or an aid to the cause he supports. [Applause.] I say this without any intention of personal criticism of the gentleman, but I desire to point out to him where he is not aiding his cause.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman has a perfect right to criticize me and my conduct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not endeavoring to do that, and I would not have brought the gentleman into it if he had not brought himself in.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman was intending his criticism for me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; the gentleman from Oklahoma is not the only one who has made points of no quorum.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I want to say that the gentleman's position in the caucus does not square exactly with his talk on the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is where the gentleman is dreaming. [Laughter.] In the caucus a resolution that I presented at the clerk's desk originally had in it a provision in reference to rural credits, but when it was ascertained that the committee was not ready to report, that there was a difference between the committee and the Executive as to this bill, and the bill could not be reported to the House, it would have been folly for the caucus at that time to insist that a rural-credit bill should be a part of the program, a bill that had not been reported and a bill that had not been acted upon. To put it in the resolution would stop all business until the business of the program was completed. That would have been absurd.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Does not the gentleman know that the subcommittee has reported a bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Oklahoma, I am sure, is well enough acquainted with the rules of this House to know that a subcommittee can not report a bill to this House. [Applause.] I understand the subcommittee has agreed on a report; and I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that I have read the bill of the subcommittee and it meets with my personal approval.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. It does not meet with my approval.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then the gentleman is using obstructive tactics in favor of a bill that is not yet written because this one that is written does not suit him. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, as I said, the gentleman's position is not as strong as mine in reference to the rural credits proposition.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman stated a moment ago that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] was not the only man who made the point of no quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did.

Mr. WINGO. As I on yesterday made the point of no quorum on two different occasions, and as the gentleman is now undertaking, as leader of the party, to read a lecture, I want to know if his lecture is intended for me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I said before, and stated to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON], I am not attempting to lecture him or anyone else. I am stating, as it is my duty to state, the party conditions in this House and appealing to this House to do business. [Applause.] I will say to the gentleman that I, of course, did not intend to bring either the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] or the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] into this controversy. I did not expect to mention any names. Here is the result——

Mr. WINGO. Before the gentleman goes to that I want to ask him a further question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. WINGO. Does not the gentleman think it would be fairer to mention names and not deal in the class of criticisms he was making before the gentleman from Oklahoma interrupted?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not.

Mr. WINGO. I will state to the gentleman that I would much prefer, when he undertakes to read a lecture to me, that he call my name so that I may answer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas that really I had forgotten he was one of the gentlemen who had made the point of no quorum. [Laughter and applause.] I mean that in good faith.

Mr. WINGO. And I will state to the gentleman, in view of the emissary who came to me this morning, I am, of course, very much surprised at the gentleman's latter remark.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I had forgotten it. I did not have the gentleman in mind at all when I made the remark.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, the gentleman can be gratuitously facetious if he wishes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I do not intend it for facetiousness. I mean it as a statement of fact. I had overlooked the fact that the gentleman himself had made the point of no quorum.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman may as well understand that a few Democrats and a few Republicans do not constitute the Committee on Banking and Currency, which has not met since last September, and I have not received any notice or any word of any of the conferences, and yet I am a member of that committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is just the point that I desire to come to. I did not desire to bring the gentleman from Oklahoma or the gentleman from Arkansas into this question, but now, as they have themselves come into the matter, I desire to bring to their attention their own statements, that here is a bill that has been agreed on by a subcommittee, which the gentleman from Oklahoma says he does not agree to——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the gentleman from Arkansas says this committee has not been in session since September and has not considered it, and yet these gentlemen are prepared to stop the business of this House because a committee that one of them is a member of has not acted on this question. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman wants to be fair?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly, I do.

Mr. WINGO. I have made no effort to obstruct public business. The gentleman sat by me this morning when I very clearly insisted that I would not object as long as we were considering appropriation bills or antitrust bills, presuming that the Democratic caucus was sincere when it acted, and that I would object only when they undertook to frivol away time, as they have been doing for four weeks on Calendar Wednesday. As a matter of fact, the gentleman from Alabama knows that there has been a pussy-footed filibuster going on on Calendar Wednesday for four weeks. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do; and I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas that it is absolutely unjustifiable.

Mr. WINGO. That is all I have tried to stop.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that, although I came in here to answer roll calls, I was not here when he made the point of order, and that is the reason I had overlooked that he had made it.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; but I will ask the gentleman not to take up too much of my time.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I shall not take up much of the gentleman's time. Does not the gentleman think that it is quite important that the rural-credit bill should be reported here in view of the fact that the Democratic caucus last August instructed the Banking and Currency Committee to bring in this rural-credit bill at this session?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So much so that I framed that resolution of instructions myself.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. After voting against incorporating it in the banking and currency act?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. When a few of us were insisting that it should go there in that act?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the result of the committee's action up to this time, the delay, shows that they were not prepared to write a rural-credit bill at that time without greatly delaying the other bills.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. And a few of these fellows who are interested in banks never will be able to write a real farmers' credit bill. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not going to fall out with the gentleman about that proposition, but he must remember the committee must agree before we can get the legislation on the calendar.

Now, I want, with the utmost good nature, to call to the attention of the gentleman what we are doing by filibustering in favor of a bill that is not reported, a bill that it is impossible for this House to act on, a bill that I would gladly vote for a rule to consider whenever it is prepared to come before this House. In the meantime filibustering tactics and delays will delay the enactment into law of the great trust bills that the Democratic Party promised to this country. It will delay the enactment into law of a bill to extend the time for the settlers on irrigated lands to pay for their homesteads. It will delay the time for the consideration of a bill in order that the great West may have legislation on the statute books by which its public lands can be leased and settlement encouraged. It will delay the time when we may consider a bill that is reported and on the calendar stopping gambling in cotton contracts and taking care of the southern farmer. [Applause.] It will delay the time when we can consider a bill that is being considered and to be reported to do the same thing for the grain farmer of the West. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. THOMPSON or Oklahoma. I want to ask the gentleman if he did not vote against the proposition of incorporating a provision prohibiting national banks, or these banks under the Federal reserve system, from loaning money for the purpose of gambling in farm products?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not recall the provision the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. There was a provision introduced to that bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Senator CLARK sent over to the House an amendment to the tariff bill prohibiting cotton gambling, or, rather, taxing it out of existence. I offered it as an amendment, and it passed this House, and it would have been enacted into law if the Senate itself had not receded from its own amendment, and a bill since that time in substance has been passed by the Senate, and, I understand, is reported and on the calendar to be considered, or has it been reported?

Mr. TAYLOR of New York. It has not been reported yet—not before the end of this week.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will be reported shortly.

I am not criticizing the gentleman from Oklahoma, and do not desire to do so. My criticism is general. I say we ought to get an early adjournment in July [applause], and I say to accomplish that result it is the duty of every Member to stay here and attend the sessions of the committee and the House, and it is also the duty of every Member not to throw unreasonable obstructions and delays in the way of public business. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman from Wisconsin would consume some of his time.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Washington begins I would like to know how much time I have left?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-seven minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, if there is anything that grieves me beyond expression it is a Democratic quarrel; and if I thought I was equal to the task I would attempt to pour oil upon the troubled waters.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And then set the oil afire?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think it would set itself afire from the heat that has been displayed on the other side. It would not be necessary to do anything but furnish the oil. But, Mr. Chairman, I am consoled by the fact that the more Democratic dissension we have the better it is for the country. [Applause on the Republican side.] I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that we ought to adjourn as soon as possible. The greatest blessing that the Democratic Party could confer upon this country would be to pass the appropriation bills and adjourn and never assemble again. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it would have been a greater blessing if the standpat Republican Congress had adjourned before they passed the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think it would be a great deal better for the Democratic Party if it had adjourned before it passed the Underwood bill, and in that opinion I am in accord with a great majority of the people in this country after six months' experience under it. [Applause on the Republican side.] I agree with the gentleman from Alabama that what this country needs is more prosperity and less legislation. Now, I want just for a moment to call attention to a few features suggested by the very wise observation made by the gentleman from Texas

[Mr. GARRETT]. I want to compare just for a few moments the Payne-Aldrich law, to which he referred, and the Underwood law. We have now had some experience with this new Democratic law. We have had some six months' experience of having our wits sharpened in contest with foreign countries in accordance with the advice and suggestion of the President. I want to call your attention to some of the results. It will be remembered that one of the greatest contentions of the Democratic Party was that we needed a reduction of the tariff in order that we might go out and capture the markets of the world. Now, let me give you a few figures. Taking this year, from October 1 to April 1 and comparing it with the like period of last year. This is six months under the new tariff law. I find that in that period from October 1 to April 1 of this year that our imports were $228,000,000 as against $215,000,000 of the same period of last year. That shows how the foreigner is capturing our markets. That is the way we always capture theirs under a Democratic tariff.

I find that manufacturers' materials—that is, materials that are brought into this country and used in manufactures here—that during that same period our imports were $469,000,000, while last year for the same period they were $517,000,000. These figures tell in vivid language that can not be disputed a marked decrease in manufacturing in this country, while we are constantly increasing our purchase of manufactured articles finished abroad. No one can read these figures and fail to understand why many of our mills are closed, why wages are being reduced, and why the army of the unemployed constantly increases. No one can look at these figures and then fail to understand the universal fear and mistrust in which this administration is held by the business interests of this country. No one can look upon these figures and fail to understand why there is everywhere in this Nation to-day fear, dread, and uncertainty. No one can study these figures and fail to understand the universal feeling of lack of confidence in all branches of business in this country. These figures show the folly and the falseness of every Democratic promise and prediction as to the result of the Underwood bill. They refute every slander and attack made by the enemies of the Payne law. These figures demonstrate that the Payne law meant prosperity, that the Underwood law means poverty.

Let us look upon this new tariff law for a few moments as a revenue producer. I find that during the first six months of that law, from October 1, 1913, to April 1, 1914, the customs receipts were $140,000,000. During the same period last year they were $165,000,000. During the same period the excess of expenditures for this year over receipts was $37,000,000. During the same period last year the excess of receipts over expenditures was $7,500,000, or a balance in favor of the working of the Payne law that my friend from Texas [Mr. GARRETT] refers to, during six months, of $44,500,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] And yet my friend from Texas wishes to make a few sneering remarks about the Payne-Aldrich law. I suggest he get these figures and circulate them throughout his district.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Is the gentleman in favor of the Payne-Aldrich bill?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes, sir. I voted for it, and I never regretted or apologized for it; and to-day my country stands for my opinion of it.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. What part of the country?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. All except Texas, where they managed to save "their goat" under the Underwood law.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The last election returns do not indicate that the gentleman is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Why, the majority of the people of this country voted in favor of protection. My Democratic friend goes strutting up and down the aisle as though he thought the majority of the people approved the Democratic Party.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Have they heard from New Jersey?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Have you heard from New Jersey recently? And another thing, if it will console the gentleman any, day before yesterday the city of Martinsburg, in West Virginia, that is now represented by a Democrat in this House, went Republican by a majority of 500, the first time in 10 years. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield to me for just one question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. ADAIR. I would like to ask the gentleman if the question as to the indorsement of the Payne bill did not occur at the election of 1910? Was not that an indication of what the people think of it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman probably can interpret that as well as I can. I want to talk about the Underwood bill. Let us talk about something that is still on the statute books. Let us talk about something the Democrats have been bragging about.

Now, the increase of manufactured articles imported into this country—now, listen how you are capturing the markets of the world, how your tariff law is letting us into the markets of the foreigner and keeping the foreigner out of ours—the increase in imports of November, 1913, over that of November, 1912, was $2,000,000. The increase of imports in December, 1913, over December, 1912, was $7,000,000. The increase in January, 1914, over January, 1913, was $4,000,000. The increase in February, 1914, over February, 1913, was $5,000,000. The increase in March, the last month for which I have the figures, under this Underwood law, under the law that was to enable us to go out and capture the markets of the world, of imports of manufactured products into this country was over $8,000,000 greater than in March a year ago. Now, look at the other side of the picture. The exports in March, 1914, were $133,000,000; the exports in March, 1913, were $183,000,000; or, in other words, the goods that we sold in foreign markets decreased $50,000,000 last March under this law that was to give us the control of the markets of the world.

In the last month of the Payne-Aldrich law—September, 1913—the exports exceeded the imports by $45,000,000. In the last month of the Underwood law the imports exceeded the exports $1,000,000. Or, taking the last month of the Payne law, compared with the last month of the Underwood law, the balance in our favor under the Payne law, in favor of our country, was $46,000,000. That is the law that they are telling you is bringing such great prosperity to this country—a law that during the month of last March alone brought a balance to the foreigner of $46,000,000. The imports since the Underwood law has gone upon the statute books in the first six months have increased 37 per cent. The exports during the first six months of the Underwood law have decreased 31 per cent. How we are capturing the markets of the world! Is it any wonder that people are out of employment, that men are idle, that wages are being reduced, when you look at these figures and see that our imports have increased 37 per cent and our exports have decreased 31 per cent in the first six months of the "New Freedom" under the new law that has given us the opportunity to experience the blessings of foreign competition? Or, in other words, while the people of this country are buying less food than they did a year ago they are purchasing much more abroad. While they are wearing fewer clothes than they did a year ago they are purchasing more abroad. While there is less work in this country to-day than there was a year ago, yet we are giving more work to the foreigner. While the workingmen in this country are earning less wages to-day than they did a year ago, we are paying far more wages to the foreigner to do our work. We are getting rich by producing employment abroad and idleness at home. The Democratic doctrine is, give your money and your work to the foreigner if you would prosper at home.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Has my colleague heard or read that one week ago the Department of Agriculture issued an order that all cases of eggs brought into this country from China should be marked "Product of China"?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I understood that they had done something of that kind. I know that will be a great blessing to the poor man in my State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And another shipload has arrived in the last two days in Puget Sound, and the price of eggs at retail has not been reduced.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit a pertinent interruption?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to inquire if he has seen the press reports to the effect that the Congregationalists throughout New England will observe next week as a week of prayer for the unemployed in New England?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; I have it right here on my desk, and I will say that is a very familiar thing. It reminds me of the blessed Democratic days of 20 years ago. I hold here in my hand the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and seeing my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] sitting over there, it calls to my attention a remark he made the other day when the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND] was making a speech. He said:

Mr. Chairman, I have taken occasion to make an investigation of the prices on 12 leading farm articles for the last 10 years in the markets of Chicago and New York, and of those 12 farm articles for 10 years, on the 1st day of March, 9 of them are higher this 1st day of March than they have been any time in the last 10 years.

That is the way the Democratic Party is reducing the cost of living.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In just a moment. Wait until I have finished reading. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND] in that same speech said:

From the tables which have been presented the conclusion reached is a conclusion of fact. Notwithstanding the reduction in the new tariff law and the importations which have followed its enactment, the farmers of the United States are receiving better prices for their products than they received a year ago.

Now, those statements were made here upon the floor of this House on the 8th day of May. On the day before a distinguished gentleman in another body in this Capitol, belonging to the same political faith as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND], inserted an article in the RECORD intended to demonstrate that the prices of farm products are now less than they were before the enactment of the Underwood bill. That table was furnished to him, it seems, by a grocer, and that grocer, in transmitting it to the distinguished gentleman, said:

I feel that you are entitled to know of this great reduction in the cost of living in the larger cities of the State of New Hampshire, and I shall be pleased to have you lay these facts before the United States Senate.

That letter comes from a grocer, so that evidently his profits have not been reduced, as he makes no complaint. So we have now the beauties of this Democratic tariff, according to Democratic authority: The farmer is receiving more for his products; the man who sells them is getting just as much as before; and the man who buys them gets them for less. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

My distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] used to refer in terms of a great deal of scorn to a distinguished Progressive, who in making a political speech said that if his party went into power——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. COOPER. I yield one minute to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. He said that if that party went into power it would place a law on the statute books that would increase the price of everything that everyone sold and decrease the price of everything that everyone bought; but the Democratic Party, according to their own statement in the RECORD, has beaten the Progressives to it. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will yield to the gentleman if I have time.

Mr. CLINE. I want to correct the gentleman's impression he seeks to leave with the House, namely, that the Democrats promised to reduce the high cost of living by reducing the price of farm products. No Democrat every proclaimed that the Democratic Party would reduce the high cost of living by taking the price out of the farmer's profits. No man ever claimed that the farmer was getting too much or even enough. They did claim that they would reduce the high cost of living by attempting to break up the monopolies which the trusts and combinations had formed while your party was in power.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You said in your platform that the main cause of the high cost of living was the tariff.

Mr. CLINE. That is true, but we never said the cost of living would be reduced by a reduction in the price that the farmer gets for his products.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You said you would reduce the cost of living. Have you done it?

Mr. CLINE. We have made reductions in the price of some articles, notably in the price of clothing, which is not as high now as it was during the Taft administration.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You had better revise your remarks in the RECORD if you have reduced the cost of living.

The Democratic platform declared that the tariff was the main cause of the high cost of living. Many Democrats have preached this fallacy so long that some of them actually seemed to believe it. For years in every campaign the Democratic Party has declared that the tariff was a tax and that it was added to the price of the article. The first thing they did when they came into power was to reduce the tariff to lower the price of the necessaries of life.

Now we hear a new and strange doctrine being preached day after day on this floor by these same Democrats.

They placed farm products on the free list. What for? They say that the price will not be reduced by removing the tariff. If that be true, then what becomes of the ancient Democratic faith that the tariff is a tax, that it is added to the price of the article and the consumer pays? If the removal of the tariff will not reduce the price of farm products, how will it do it with other products? How is it that the tariff works differently when applied to agricultural products than to any other? Will the Democrats that live in great cities dare say, as does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND], that the price of farm products are higher to-day than when the Underwood law went into effect? Will they dare say with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] that since placing them on the free list farm products are higher to-day than at any time in 10 years? If this be true, then why all these Democratic tears about the poor man's breakfast table? Has he ceased to eat the products of the soil? Why did the Democratic Party place farm products on the free list?

Mr. Chairman, as bearing upon the general effect of the Underwood law I will insert some articles from newspapers.

[From the Washington Herald, Monday, May 11, 1914.]

REDFIELD SHOWS TARIFF FIGURES—SHARPENING WITS OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURERS GIVES FOUR DEFINITE RESULTS—SIX MONTHS' OPERATION—INCREASED IMPORTS OFFSET BY DECREASES IN RECEIPTS, EXPORTS OF MATERIALS, AND SLOWING DOWN OF FACTORIES.

Six months' experiment with President Wilson's recipe for "sharpening the wits of American manufacturers," by opening our doors to the manufacturers of other parts of the world has given four very definite results: First, an increase in importations of manufactures; second, a slowing down of our own factories; third, a falling off of the exports of manufactures; and, fourth, a falling off in revenue.

The official record for the first half year of the tariff law's operation is now available, the Department of Commerce's statement of imports and exports for March completing the figures for six months.

OFFICIAL STATISTICS.

The value of finished manufactures imported in the six months' operation of the law, October 1 to April 1, is $228,000,000, against $215,000,000 in the same period of last year; the value of manufacturers' material imported is $469,000,000, against $517,000,000; the value of manufactures exported is $541,000,000, against $582,000,000; and the receipts from customs are but $140,000,000, against $165,000,000 in the same months of last year.

Meantime the deficit in the Treasury accounts continues to mount Saturday's official statement showing the "excess of ordinary disbursements" for the fiscal year is $37,097,955, as against an "excess of revenue receipts" of $7,395,706 for the same period of the last fiscal year when the Payne tariff was in operation; or, to put it in ordinary terms, a deficit of $37,000,000 this fiscal year against a surplus of $7,500,000 at this time last year. The administration is depending on the income tax to pull it out of the hole.

REDUCTION IN RECEIPTS.

In every month of the period in which the new law has been industriously "sharpening the wits of American manufacturers" by bringing in foreign manufactures at reduced rates of duty, the customs receipts have fallen below those of the corresponding period of last year. In five of the six months the imports of finished manufactures have exceeded those of the same months of the preceding year; and in four of the six months the imports of manufacturers' materials and the exports of manufacturers have fallen short of the record of the corresponding months of last year.

The first month of the new law did show on its face a lower valuation of manufactures imported than in the same month of the preceding year, but this was due to the fact that much of this class of merchandise had been imported and placed in warehouse in the preceding month, thus appearing in the import records of September, while they, in fact, entered in October under the new law. In every other month of the period the imports of finished manufactures is greater than in the same months of last year.

COMPARISON OF MONTHS.

The excess in November, the second month of the new law, was less than $2,000,000 when compared with November of the preceding year; December, $7,000,000; January, $4,000,000; February, $5,000,000; and March, $8,000,000. The closing month of the period also showed larger total imports than any other, $183,000,000 against $133,000,000 in its first month. On the other hand, the exports of domestic products have steadily fallen, the figure for October, 1913, having been $269,000,000, and in March, 1914, but $184,000,000.

The imports in the six months increased over 37 per cent, while the exports decreased over 31 per cent in the same period. In the last month of the Payne tariff, September, 1913, the exports of domestic products exceeded the imports by $45,000,000; in March, 1914, the sixth month under the Underwood tariff, the exports of domestic products exceeded the imports by barely $1,000,000.

It is the persistent fall in the importation of manufacturers' materials, however, that there is the gravest concern. No part of the machinery of the Government gives such excellent opportunity to measure the activities of the manufacturers of the country as does the record of the imports of their requirements for manufacturing and of the manufactures which come in competition with them.

The record of imports of manufactures during the six months' operation of the new law, including in this term the materials for further use in manufacturing, shows a total of but $469,000,000 against $517,000,000 in the same months of last year, while the record of finished manufactures imported shows $228,000,000 against $215,000,000 in the same months of the preceding year and under the preceding tariff.

PRICES NOT REDUCED.

Nor can it be said that the fall in value of manufacturers' materials imported is due to lower prices. An examination of the detailed records of the period shows, in many cases, much smaller quantities of the various materials brought in in the recent months. The total quantity of raw cotton imported in the six months under the new law is but 51,000,000 pounds against 79,000,000 pounds in the same period of last year; pig tin for use in the tin-plate factories, 37,000,000 pounds against 46,000,000 pounds; hides and skins, 280,000,000 pounds against 295,000,000 pounds; rubber, 62,000,000 pounds against 63,000,000 pounds; and in many other articles of this class there is a like falling off in quantity imported.

In those articles of manufacture in which the duty was reduced in order to "sharpen the wits" of their producers at home, there has been a striking increase in importation and in most cases a corresponding decrease in exportation, due apparently to a slowing down in production by our manufacturers. In tin plate, for example, in which the duty was decreased about one-third, the imports of the six months under the new tariff were more than 33,000,000 pounds against less than 3,000,000 in the same months of last year, an increase of 1,000 per cent, while the exports fell from 74,000,000 in the six months of last year to 43,000,000 pounds in the six months under the new law.

LEATHER AND ITS MANUFACTURES.

In leather and its manufactures, in which the duties were either removed or largely reduced, the imports increased over 40 per cent, while the exports declined 15 per cent. In cotton manufactures, on which there was a reduction of duties, the imports show an increase of nearly $5,000,000, while the exports show a falling off in total values. Duties on iron and steel manufactures were reduced, and the exports of iron and steel manufactures have fallen $30,000,000 in the six months' period.

Meantime the talk about increased supplies of food and reduced prices through removal of duties on foodstuffs is making manifest its real qualities. The records of the six months show an importation of 83,000,000 pounds of fresh beef in that period, or about 2 ounces per month for each individual in the United States, but the official records of the Department of Commerce show that the price at which the importation occurred was over 30 per cent higher in March, under the new law, than in September, the last month of the old law, while in many other of the articles on which duties were reduced the prices abroad were promptly advanced.

BIG SLUMP IN STEEL BUSINESS IN MARCH—DECREASE IN UNFILLED ORDERS LARGER THAN HAD BEEN ANTICIPATED—CONTINUES DURING APRIL—OUTLOOK DISCOURAGING IN VIEW OF THE IMPROVEMENT AT BEGINNING OF YEAR.

The slump in the steel business during March was shown yesterday in the decrease of 372,615 tons in unfilled orders of the United States Steel Corporation on the books on March 31, as compared with the orders at the end of February.

This was bigger than expected. Estimates had placed the decrease at from 300,000 to 350,000 tons. The corporation had 4,653,825 tons of unfilled orders at the end of March, against 5,026,440 at the end of February.

The slump in the industry during March, which is continuing this month, according to all reports, was exceedingly discouraging, because of the improvement that had been made in January and February. The big slump came with the advent of the tariff on October 3. The corporation dropped 500,000 tons in its tonnage during that month. There was a further slump of about 200,000 to the end of December, when the industry reached its lowest ebb.

The end of January saw a recovery of 331,000 tons, and the close of February saw a further improvement of 413,000 tons. This was the peak of the recovery, and March has seen an ebbing back to a low state of business. The tonnage reported yesterday, however, is higher than any since September, with the exception of February.

The Steel Corporation, it is reported, is working on about 50 per cent of capacity.

The following table gives the record of unfilled tonnage for periods back:

MILL NOTES.

FALL RIVER.

The mill situation: Mills are continuing to report further losses of skilled help and a more extended reduction of production. Idle machinery throughout the mills has been estimated this week at approximately 85 per cent, and it is expected that the enforced curtailment will reach one-fifth of the total production within a short time.

The exodus to outdoor employment has already begun, and it is affecting mostly the weaving department, where the skilled operatives are employed. Yet the treasurers are not, apparently, disturbed, and in many cases they are even satisfied to shut down a fifth of their machinery. They point out that goods are now piling up and the idle machinery affords a curtailment that will keep down the accumulation. Conditions for the next few weeks will be watched with keen interest by the treasurers, because of the general feeling that failure to improve will result in a curtailment policy. Such a plan will be taken up only as a last resort, because the millmen realize that the labor shortage is a serious problem here, and every effort is to be made to keep all the skilled help possible in the mills and in the city.

Textile union officials are also viewing the situation with interest, but whatever plans were considered for a renewal of the agitation for a wage increase have been abandoned for a time at least. They realize that conditions do not warrant steps toward an increase in wages, and this matter will probably not be taken up by the textile council until some marked improvement in the trade is apparent.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 48 minutes.

Mr. COOPER. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the Department of Commerce is presided over by a gentleman who is distinguished for his ability upon the platform and with his pen. Ordinarily it would have been thought that these accomplishments, while always valuable and sometimes necessary, were not indispensable for the position which he holds. It seems, however, that these qualifications are absolutely necessary if the department is to enter into political campaigns through the newspapers.

There are, of course, some critical individuals who would insist that, while a member of the Cabinet might as an individual properly appear on the stump, his department, as such, had no business in politics, and that when issuing official circulars it should confine itself to facts, without attempting to draw political conclusions from them through a perversion of the figures. But it should be remembered that these are the days of the "new freedom," when everybody is free except Congress, and that is free—to do as the President dictates. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

If the administration wanted a press agent and advertising manager—and just now it needs one badly—it could not get a better one than the present Secretary of Commerce; but he has been extremely unfortunate in the materials with which he had to work. The time has arrived when the acid test is to be applied to the new tariff law. Neither Republicans nor Democrats can longer speak with the voice of prophecy. Results now speak for themselves. Further trial is not needed to show the effects of the Underwood tariff upon business, nor is it even necessary to state it. Everyone knows that business is depressed, that commerce is halting, and that trade is stagnated. He who makes these statements can no longer be characterized as a "prophet of evil." He does not prophesy; he recites the facts; and he is but doing his duty when he informs the American people as to who are responsible for these conditions.

The press bureau of the Secretary of Commerce is organized for the purpose of persuading the people that this situation is not caused by the tariff, and from time to time he issues bulletins intended to show that it is working favorably.

I have not time to take up all of these bulletins, but I shall undertake to discuss the latest issue, which is a fair sample of the others. I hold this document in my hand. It is headed:

CONFIDENTIAL—FOR THE USE OF MORNING PAPERS OF THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1914.

It purports to give the latest advices on our export and import trade and is prepared with the evident attempt to show that the new tariff is a success.

This particular publication is one of the most striking exhibits of the peculiar ability of the Secretary to color a bad situation with radiant words. I read from his review of conditions for March:

In crude materials for use in manufacturing there is shown a balance of trade against the United States of about $6,500,000. Nevertheless, this is a great improvement over March, 1913, when imports in that class exceeded $55,600,000, and exports were but a little more than $36,000,000 and the balance of trade against the United States more than $19,600,000.

This sounds plausible but will not bear analysis.

As a matter of course, the larger the balance of trade in our favor with reference to manufactured goods the greater the prosperity of our factories; but with reference to raw material for manufacturing, a gain in such balance necessarily shows that our manufacturers are languishing, for it means either that our factories are taking from abroad less raw material to be worked up by American labor, the pay for which labor will go to American workmen, or it means that we are not using in our factories as much of raw material produced in our own country as before, but are sending this material abroad to be manufactured and returned to us as the finished product, for which work we will pay European artisans, or it may mean a combination of both of these matters.

If the Secretary of Commerce is disposed to rejoice over such a condition, he need not have confined himself to the one month of March, but could take great pleasure in recording that in the six months ending with that month, under the new law, we imported but 51,000,000 pounds of raw cotton, as against 79,000,000 in the same period of last year. He could also congratulate the country on the fact that we imported but 37,000,000 pounds of pig tin for use in our tin-plate factories, against 46,000,000 under the old law. He could be happy in the thought that of hides and skins we imported only 280,000,000 pounds, as against 295,000,000, and he could become quite hilarious over the fact that there is a great falling off of the importation of other articles consumed by our factories, either as raw material or as partly manufactured merchandise to be finished by them. It is hardly necessary to show the other side of this picture, for with these figures before us we know what has happened. We imported nearly $5,000,000 worth more of manufactured cotton during this period than we did under the old law for the same months, and our workmen lost the wages which they should have obtained in making this cloth and our manufacturers some profits. Our importations of tin plate for this period were more than ten times as much as they had been under the old law for the same time, being 33,000,000 pounds against 3,000,000. There was an increase also in the same time of about 40 per cent in imported leather and its manufactures.

But this is only one part of the story of the decline of our industries. While we have increased the amount of raw material which we have sent abroad and decreased our importations for the use of our factories, the increase in the amount of manufactured goods and foodstuffs imported has brought the balance of trade in our favor down almost to the vanishing point. In the same circular before referred to, the Commerce Department, hunting for bright spots, calls attention to the fact that our balance of trade for that month as to Germany and France is more favorable than for the same months of 1913.

Sporadic instances of this kind may be found, but the fact remains that the total of our imports increased $26,000,000 for that month, and that we imported over $8,000,000 more of manufactured goods ready for consumption in last March than the March of 1913, and the balance of trade in our favor on all imports and exports was only $4,800,000, which is about $23,000,000 more unfavorable to us than in March, 1912. The Secretary takes pains to state in this circular that for the nine months ending last March the balance of trade in our favor was $484,700,000. This sounds well, but the only good part of it was produced under a Republican law. The new tariff could scarcely be said to be working until the month of November last. One of the most important schedules, that of wool, did not go into effect until January 1, and on sugar it only went into effect on March 1. Nevertheless, the five months ending March 1 show a loss in our balance of trade of $137,000,000 as compared with the same time the year before.

Last January Secretary Redfield, in addressing the New Haven Chamber of Commerce, thus declared himself:

> Even the fearful have seen with surprise—and I hope with growing confidence—that the flood of foreign goods that was to overwhelm us has not happened; that the stories of how the cheap products of the pauper labor of Europe were to crowd our marts of trade to the exclusion of our own goods, have proved to have no foundation more than any old wives' tale, and how, in the face of what must seem to them an almost open door, our products have gone outward and foreign products have not come inward as the prophets of evil said.

I suppose I am one of the "prophets of evil," but my prophecies in that respect have come true. The Secretary of Commerce would not make these statements at the present time, I fancy.

Is it any "old wives' tales" that we imported $5,000,000 more of finished manufactures in December, 1913, than in December, 1912; that in January of this year our importations over the previous January were increased by nearly $4,000,000; and is it strange that the "fearful" did not get any more confidence in February, when the imports were increased nearly $6,000,000, and that the "confident" lost hope entirely when they found the "flood" increasing to the amount of more than $8,000,000 in March? These figures are taken from the monthly reports of his own department. But this is not the worst of the situation. Our exports are continually decreasing, not merely in agricultural products, but also in the products of our manufactories. In January last our exports of finished manufactures fell off $8,000,000. In February the decrease was nearly $11,000,000; in March, $5,000,000. This is the way in which "our products are going outward" and "capturing the markets of the world" under the new tariff.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Has the gentleman heard whether Haman's gibbet has been taken down?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think it has. It ought not to have been. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I assume that the gentleman refers to the one which the President was going to erect. It is needed, but not in the way he intended.

Truly our manufacturers need to "whet their wits." Is it strange that from every quarter we hear reports of factories running on part time, of men out of employment, and of general paralysis of trade?

Mr. Chairman, the railways of this country have recently been contending for an increase of rates before the Interstate Commerce Commission. What the commission will determine I can not tell, but I do know this: That what the railways need is not so much an increase of rates as a Republican administration and a Republican tariff. [Applause on the Republican side.] Under the Republican tariff the receipts of our railways reached the highest point ever known, and last year both gross receipts and net income were steadily climbing upward until the new tariff went into effect. As soon as it was fully in operation both gross and net receipts declined and have been ever since declining. On the first of this month there were over 228,000 idle freight cars reported. Last May the report showed less than 40,000. The conditions of the railways simply indicate the blight that has been cast upon all kinds of business by the Democratic administration. When business is good people travel on business and on pleasure, merchandise is being transported back and forth, the whirring wheels of the factories make the wheels of the freight cars turn; but as business declines people travel less, they have no occasion to ship goods, and inevitably business declines and idle cars increase.

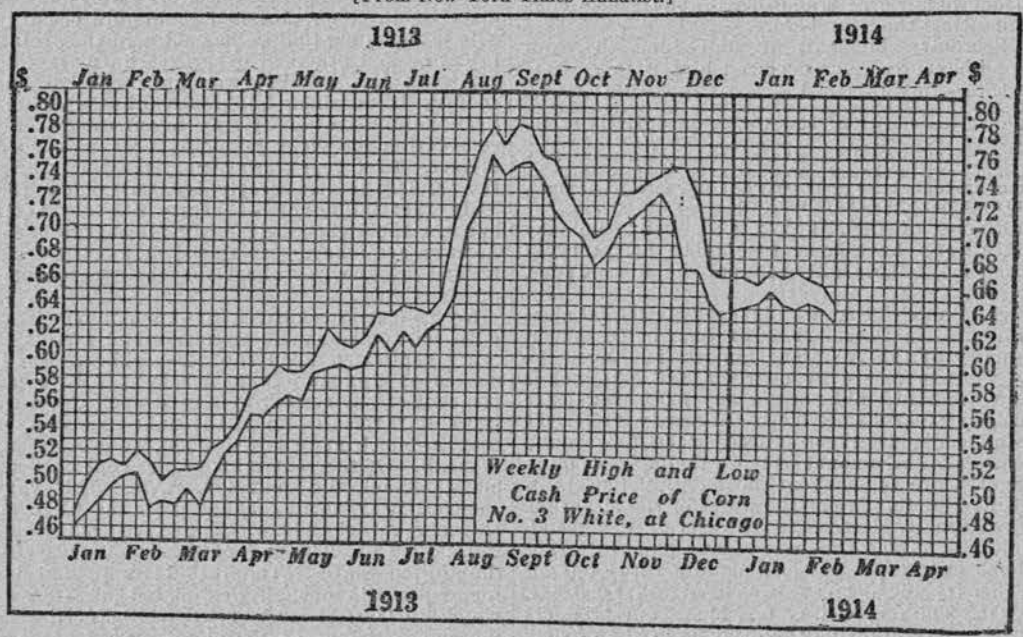
Mr. Chairman, the injuries inflicted by the tariff have not fallen alone upon the manufacturer or the business man. The agriculturist has suffered as severely, and the loss has occurred in all lines of produce and farm animals from the smallest items to the greatest.

The other day my colleague, Mr. VOLLMER, paid a glowing tribute to the Iowa hen, whose "son never set." This may be true, but "her sun" is dangerously near an eclipse when we note in the dispatches that in a single cargo 1,000 tons of eggs, nearly 7,000,000 in number, have been received in Vancouver, mostly for shipment to this country. The Iowa housewife has not yet a vote, but when she finds on taking eggs to market that they must be sold in competition with Chinamen the Democratic Party will hear from her.

Mr. SLOAN. The Chinese hens are laying for them. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And the Iowa farmer's wife will "lay" for the Democratic Party. My colleague [Mr. VOLLMER] also referred to the importations of Argentine corn, and scouted the idea that the shipments from that country could have any appreciable effect upon our markets. The gentleman is one of the most distinguished lawyers in my State, and has recently given evidence on this floor of his oratorical powers, but I am safe in assuming that he has not made a careful study of market prices or had practical experience in marketing farm products. The corn crop of 1912 was the largest in the history of the country, being about 3,100,000,000 bushels; but under a Republican administration it was taken care of at a price which, considering the yield per acre, returned a good revenue to the farmer. Last year's crop was nearly a failure in many localities, and it totaled nearly 700,000,000 less than that of 1912. With this falling off of nearly one-fourth of the number of bushels, the Democratic Party is congratulating itself that the farmers are able to get almost as much for what they have to market as they obtained for their enormous surplus of the previous year.

My colleague compared the amount which Argentina exports with the total amount of corn raised in this country. He and other gentlemen upon the other side of the House who have spoken on this subject do not seem to be aware that about 85 per cent of our corn crop is used upon the farms, and that this percentage remains about the same regardless of the size of the crop, as much more is fed when the crop is large than when it is small. Of the remaining 15 per cent only around 250,000,000 bushels reach the central markets. This varying but always comparatively small amount fixes the price not only at those markets but elsewhere. The Argentine crop of 1912–13 was 255,000,000 bushels, and of this about 10,000,000 were sent to the United States. The 1913–14 crop, that is now being sold for export, is officially estimated at 348,000,000 bushels, of which 240,000,000 can be spared for export, and if Europe takes the same amount as it did last year there will be 70,000,000 to be exported to the United States. It is no wonder that we find in nearly every recent market report a statement that every offer from West to East of corn is met by offers from Argentina, with a diminishing scale as to price and an ascending scale as to quantity. The result of this great Argentine surplus upon corn prices this fall, if we should have a fairly good crop at home, can best be understood by observing the effect of the 10,000,000 bushels that came in from the crop of the preceding year.



As the prospect in this country for a good crop last year gradually faded the price steadily rose, reaching the highest point in September. In October the Argentine importations commenced under the new tariff, and the price fell off 10 cents. Subsequently it reacted, regaining about 6 cents of the loss in November, but in December it became evident that a larger crop of corn was being marketed in Argentina, and imports began again, with the result that it dropped lower than before. I am using as my authority a chart from the New York Times Annalist, a Democratic paper, which I will insert in the RECORD, if permitted. Every slight rise in price recently has been made by renewed offers of Argentine corn, cargoes of which have been sold to come to Montreal or Chicago, as high as 750,000 bushels in a single week, according to the market reports. I am informed by my colleague [Mr. HAUGEN] that the other day Argentine corn was quoted at 62 cents in Baltimore, and corresponding grade 72 cents in Chicago. The farmer has lost the eastern market for corn entirely and much of the southern.

It has been asserted that Argentine corn is inferior in quality to our own. Exactly the contrary is true. It has a smaller percentage of moisture and is more valuable for certain manufacturing purposes than our own. It is safe to say that the American farmers have lost at least 10 cents a bushel on their market surplus of corn by reason of the Argentine imports. It will thus be seen that the importations from last year's crop of Argentina caused a loss of the American farmers of not less than 10 cents a bushel upon their marketable surplus of corn, which would amount to not less than $30,000,000 and has generally been put much higher. What the losses of the farmers will be if a crop of usual size is raised this year can only be estimated, but it is likely to be double the amount last mentioned. The farmers had a right to expect, in view of the shortage in last year's crop, that the corn would be from 10 cents to 20 cents higher. Instead, those who sold generally got less than last year, and those who are holding in expectation of getting a higher price must meet additional Argentine shipments.

The brevity of the time allotted to me will not permit me to discuss as I would like the effect upon other agricultural products. About 83,000,000 pounds of fresh beef have been imported during the first six months of the new tariff. It is idle to tell the farmers of Iowa that they have suffered no loss in the price received by reason of these importations. Nearly every man who has fed cattle there during the last winter has learned a lesson concerning Democratic tariff through his pocketbook, for everyone knows that the returns did not equal those of the previous year by about $1 per hundred. Our Democratic friends have also consoled themselves with the fact that there is but slight difference in the price for hogs. They forget to mention the ravages of hog cholera which was prevalent all over the country last year. In my own State, which sends to Chicago, the greatest stock market in the world, 52 per cent of the hogs there received and 40 per cent of the cattle, the losses from hog cholera were five times as great last year as in the year preceding and were nearly as large as the total from all the States in the year 1912. Probably one-third to one-fourth of the swine of the country were carried off last year, thus reducing the "hog crop," so called, by as large if not larger proportion than the corn crop, and hogs are only worth about what they were the year before. Our opponents are welcome to such consolation as they can derive from this situation, but it will not satisfy the farmer when he comes to judge the effect of Democratic control in the case of such production of swine as may be expected when the usual number of hogs are put upon the market.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that I have not more time to show how the Democratic tariff has affected all classes of farm products, and yet we in Iowa are so far fortunate that the wave of depression has not yet struck us with its full force. It takes time for it to come from the East. So far we have only felt the effect of foreign competition. Soon we must feel the effect of decreased home consumption. Men have lost their jobs and may continue for a while to purchase supplies out of their past accumulations or upon credit, but this will not last long, and the prostration of business in the East will be reflected in decreased purchases. To what extent this will prevail I do not undertake to say. The Democratic Party, when it took charge of affairs, found the country so wealthy and so prosperous that it would seem impossible for it to entirely destroy business everywhere, although it has already brought financial ruin to many. What it has done already furnishes a sufficient lesson to the American people through bitter experience, and when they come to cast their votes next November they will turn to the Republican Party convinced that only under its wise direction can prosperity be restored and our Nation progress in commerce again resumed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE TREND OF CORN PRICES.
[From New York Times Annalist.]

EXCERPT FROM MARKET REPORT OF CHICAGO RECORD-HERALD, APRIL 13, 1914.

The pressure of the Argentine corn has been the heavy artillery of the bears. The Argentine crop is apparently so large and fine that it is being pressed for sale at a constantly declining level. It is keeping the eastern buyers out of the cash market and affecting the far Southwest actually and the nearer Southwest mentally. Meanwhile, the railroads are reducing their freight rates inland bound so as to widen the zone of influence of the Argentine grains.

Argentine cargoes aggregating about 750,000 bushels were sold last week to come to Montreal or Chicago at prices that would show little, if any, loss if sold for May delivery in the pit, but the grain would bring a far better figure in eastern territory.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I do not care what the gentleman says about his proposition. I say there is no quorum present now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that. The rules of this House are against dilatory tactics. I have the authorities here to show that time after time, even when a point of no quorum is made, that it would not be permitted because it was dilatory. We know what the purpose of the gentleman from Oklahoma is, and I am ready to submit the authorities upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has some knowledge of the precedents, and, with the indulgence of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY], the Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] makes the point of order that no quorum is present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety Members present; not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FINLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15762, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, and finding itself without a quorum had caused the roll to be called, and 232 Members had answered to their names, and he returned a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of appealing to my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] to stop the dilatory tactics that he is indulging in, and to say to him that he is not helping the farmer by the course that he is now pursuing, but he may hurt him. I see from the RECORD that my good friend was unfortunate in that he never voted at all for the splendid banking and currency bill passed by the House. That law contains one of the best provisions that any Congress has ever been able to put into a banking and currency law, and that is the provision on the extension of time on farm loans and the recognition of farm paper as merchantable paper.

We are confronted by a serious situation. With war threatened on one side with Mexico, and a big problem—the trust problem—to settle at home, and a general clamor amongst the people for an early adjournment, the President of the United States has suggested a program looking to that end. I appeal to the gentleman from Oklahoma to stop these tactics that he has carried on to-day.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma rose.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, I have only three minutes. I want to say to the gentleman it is estimated that it costs $2,500 an hour to conduct the business of this House. The gentleman has forced three roll calls this afternoon that have accomplished absolutely nothing, and the time consumed has cost this Government $5,000, and his constituents will be taxed in part to pay it. [Applause.] The gentleman is doing no good when he is making the point of no quorum. He is delaying the passage of this bill. The floor leader of this House, carrying out the suggestion of the Democratic President and the will of the Democratic caucus, is doing what he can to facilitate the business of this body that we may adjourn at an early date.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I have but little time. Mr. Chairman, there are those of us who are in favor of this legislation for the farmer, and if the gentleman will allow us and help us we will hasten this trust legislation through the House and then go to work to pass a bill on rural credits. I hope to do that, but if he keeps on with these tactics he will hurt instead of help the cause that he claims to want to help.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman's remarks are plainly out of order. He has no right to criticize and question the motives of any Member on this floor.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will withdraw that point of order.

Mr. WINGO. I will not.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I do not object to criticism from the gentleman from Alabama or anybody else when I am fighting in the interest of the farmer of this country.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not want this to be taken out of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not criticizing the motives of the gentleman from Oklahoma. I am criticizing his acts.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I have made the point of order, and I think I am entitled to a ruling upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there is a rule which provides that language complained of shall be taken down.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I hope that this will not be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed until he concludes his remarks. I like that kind of criticism from a gentleman who has been here for 10 years and who has never done anything in the interest of the farming and laboring classes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Oklahoma, who is serving in a fashion his first term, that I have served in this House for nearly 10 years, and I am perfectly willing to stand on my record of friendship for and service to the farmers of this country. My record speaks for itself, and the gentleman's statement shows how utterly innocent he is of information regarding my record. I am trying to push legislation along here so that we can reach the farm-credit bill and the bill to regulate cotton exchanges.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a little time in which to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is in the control of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Very well, if they want to criticize me without giving me opportunity to reply.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I have for a long time been greatly interested in the commercial and political development of the South American Republics. The commercial development of any country depends largely upon its political development. The geographical situation of the United States with reference to the South American Republics make their trade and political relationship much more important to us than to any other country. Since 1823, nearly a century ago, the United States has felt a growing interest in the welfare and progress of these Republics. It went so far in that year as to give official notice that we should consider any attempt upon the part of any European Government to colonize their territory as inimical not only to their interests but to our own. I am not addressing myself, however, to the Monroe doctrine so much as I am to the trade possibilities for our people in the rapidly growing Republics of South America. We have only two great competitors for the foreign trade of these Republics—England and Germany. It is well known to everybody that the construction of the Panama Canal will give us a great advantage in distance over our competitors in reaching part of this trade. It is also known that foreign trade is stimulated and developed through the consular service of the several countries seeking to obtain the same. It is therefore apparent that if we desire to capture our portion of the South American trade we must keep up with the rapid pace set by England and Germany in its consular service. These countries are new, and to them has turned a great tide of immigration that is building up their cities and settling on their boundless areas of fertile land. The leading nations of South America are not manufacturing people. They are more largely devoted to agriculture. Their increase of importations is indicated by the fact that their total import trade in 1911 was valued at $790,000,000; in 1912, at $900,000,000; in 1913, $1,000,000,000. Of this amount, in 1911 we took $132,000,000, or about 17 per cent; in 1912, 16 per cent. Our trade relationships, compared with England and Germany, is as follows: England, first; Germany, second; and the United States, third. This fact can not but be somewhat humiliating when we are the second export nation in the world, our export trade for the year 1913 being nearly twice that of Germany, and yet the German people were able to come into the markets that should belong to us and capture our trade. This was done through the effectiveness of the German consular service and its associated business methods. I am including in my remarks a compilation from official documents showing expenditures of the British, German, and United States Governments on their consular service in 1907 and 1912, arranged by countries.

In 1907 we spent the following sums:

	United States.	England.	Germany.
Argentina	$14,974	$24,819	[1] $17,797
Bolivia	(2)	3,406	8,568
Brazil	47,670	58,772	74,762
Chile	17,953	37,179	16,767
Colombia	10,930	4,379	8,568
Ecuador	7,321	7,785	7,328
Paraguay	2,502	4,623	7,806
Peru	10,046	14,963	5,702
Uruguay	5,910	4,623	8,568
Venezuela	13,913	6,182	8,560
Total (1907)	101,902	119,010	80,417
Total (1912)	131,249	166,822	171,584
Increase for 1912	29,329	47,812	91,167

[1] Buenos Aires alone. [2] Nothing.

In other words, Germany has more than doubled her expenditures on her consular service in South America since 1907, while we are expending less than $30,000 more than we did in 1907.

We have spent $400,000,000 on the construction of the Panama Canal. That will bring Ecuador, Peru, Chile, and the west coast of Colombia very near to us. These countries are now buying $25,000,000 a year from the United States and five times as much from European countries, $125,000,000. In other words, we can get in our export trade an amount equal to 30 per cent of our national investment in Panama if we will go after the business of the west coast of South America. We can never do this unless we strengthen and increase our Consular Service there. Although Brazil and Argentina are not affected, so far as distance is concerned, materially by the construction of the Panama Canal, it is just as important that we should use every effort to get our share of the great and growing business of these two leading countries of South America. Let me suggest a comparison. Without any lack of appreciation of the trade possibilities of China, I respectfully submit that we sold in Argentina, with its 7,500,000 people, last year nearly three times what we sold in China, with its 400,000,000 people. Yet we spent on our Consular Service in Argentina only about one-tenth of what we spent on our Consular Service in China. While the comparison is not wholly fair because of distance and race differences, yet the investment we made in the Consular Service in Argentina shows what can be accomplished through that agency. We sold Uruguay last year between a third and a half of what we sold to China, and yet we only spent in Uruguay one-twentieth of the money we spent on our Consular Service in China. Buenos Aires, Argentina, is a city of 1,500,000 white people. It is the third largest American city, tying with Philadelphia for that place. It is the second largest port in all the Americas so far as the value of the merchandise imported and exported is concerned.

The Argentine Republic has a greater per capita foreign trade than any other country in the world except Belgium and Holland. It is a third as large as the United States and the best customer we have in the world for agricultural machinery. Our exports to Argentina are more diversified and come from a wider area in the United States than can be said of those of most any other foreign country. There can be no manufacturing in Argentina, or, at least, will be none, compared with what will be done after she has reached a greater state of development, for the reason that her immigration is settling in the country and on her rich lands and engaging in the different lines of agriculture. Since April 9, 1906, our trade with Argentina has doubled. Our trade with Uruguay has more than doubled in that time. If we are to continue to improve, there can be no question but that this Government must increase the number of its consuls and its trade and commercial agencies in these countries. It is known to everybody that we do not pretend to employ the facilities for obtaining our share of this trade that the competing countries do. Both Germany and England have established their own banking facilities in the principal cities of the South American Republics. They send into these countries agricultural experts and commercial experts, and establish newspapers for the promotion of their respective interests. Undoubtedly the recent currency bill passed in this House, which permits the establishment of foreign banks, will be an agency to promote our interests. Germany prescribes in her schools, in addition to her agriculture and commercial experts, a course of study for young men, especially preparing them to represent the great business houses of Germany and its large manufacturing institutions in South American centers of trade. The predominating language of South America is Spanish, with the exception of Brazil, which is Portuguese, and some schools in our own country are providing for a course in Spanish to fit young men to represent our trade interests in that country. There is the best of feeling existing between the United States and these countries, and we should take advantage of that fact to continue the cultivation of that friendly relationship that always leads to good business relationships.

It is an interesting fact that a movement was set on foot just recently which resulted in the University of Chile exchanging students and professors with Harvard University. The Argentine Government, that heretofore has sent its graduate students to Europe to be educated in postgraduate studies, has very recently passed a law directing that its students shall be sent to this Government. They come to study law, medicine, surgery, engineering, and agriculture. These students come from the graduates of the three universities of Argentina—two students from each of them. They send those having the highest ratings and the Government pays each of them $130 a month to enter our schools and pursue a course of study along the lines indicated. The Argentine legation, so I am informed, maintains an office for the express purpose of caring for their arriving students. They may select any school they choose, of course being advised according to the course of study pursued. Six of these students arrive in this country each year from Argentina. It may be remarked in passing that the Government of Argentina has purchased thousands of dollars worth of school furniture and school appliances from the American manufacturers to equip every school in their country. The Government of Uruguay has very recently sent six young men here to study agriculture and has recently passed a law requiring all young men sent abroad to study agriculture to be sent to the United States, where the expenses are defrayed by the Government. These statements point to what may be accomplished by a careful study of conditions and an effort made to meet the same. The present appropriation bill carries two items of especial interest; one providing for the payment of $75,000 to meet the actual and necessary expenses of delegates of the United States to the Fifth International Congress of American States to be held in the city of Santiago, Chile, in September of this year. These meetings are largely attended and are rich in results for all those who participate in them. These meetings speak for a closer and better bond of union, both friendly and commercial, and should be encouraged and promoted as a necessary means of extending to the southern Republics a completer knowledge of our recourses, and through them we are able to express our anxiety to meet their trade requirements as well as our own.

The other item, $50,000, is to defray the expenses incident to the nineteenth conference of the Interparliamentary Union, to be held in Washington in 1915. Mr. Chairman, there can not possibly be a wiser expenditure of money than the amount suggested for this item. This society, composed of representatives from about all of the nations of the world, seeks the elimination of war and the settlement of international disputes by arbitration. This organization seeks to formulate those principles into proper expression and seek their adoption by the body that will appeal to the nations of the world that are tired of war and its burdens, and who seek the more civilized and peaceful methods of solving international difficulties.

I am glad to remind the House that one of our Members, Dr. BARTHOLDT, of Missouri, is a member of the Interparliamentary Union, and has done more for the accomplishment of its high and noble purposes than any other American.

Members know that we should not be behind in comparison with other countries in our endeavors to promote all those forces that make for peace, and I hope that no point of order will be made against this paragraph when it is reached.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLINE. Certainly.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. How are we to have any advantage by the construction of the Panama Canal if we pay the same tonnage that England and foreign countries pay?

Mr. CLINE. We have this advantage, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan: We are 3,000 miles nearer than our competitors are to these points.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I will say that that is true under present conditions—that we are 3,000 miles nearer those markets now without the canal.

Mr. CLINE. We will increase that distance between us and our competitors, when we open the canal, to about 3,000 miles over our competitors in reaching those markets. And I will say further that, regardless of the fact that our shipping has not entered into that transportation, we have been able, with our manufactured goods carried in British vessels, to go into ports in which the British have been selling and undersell and give the customer a better quality of goods than our competitors have been manufacturing.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. But only about 15 per cent compared with foreign countries.

Mr. CLINE. That does not lie in the fact we have not got the shipping facilities, but in the fact that we have not got the consular service to operate in these South American States to work up the trade.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLINE. In a moment. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to one fact. I have a manufacturing institution in the district I represent that does $300,000 worth of business alone in Argentina. It has done that by virtue of sending its own agents into that country to work up its trade. We have no banking facilities with the South American Republics; and in a conversation I recently had with a gentleman who traveled through those countries, he told me whenever there was a bill of lading sent to any German or English bank a copy of the bill of lading drawn in favor of an American manufacturer was sent immediately to the manufacturers of Germany and England, as the case might be.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I agree with the gentleman that we ought to build up our trade there.

Mr. CLINE. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I think I agree with the gentleman in his statement that we ought to adopt the methods of Germany, in order to develop our trade, and I wondered whether our lack of trade was due largely to the lack of facilities of communication directly between North and South America.

Mr. CLINE. Our lack of trade is not due so much to lack of facilities of communication as it is to the fact that the language of the South American Republics, with the exception of Brazil, I think, is Spanish, and in order to make trade successful you must have representative agents there who can converse in the language of those localities if you desire to increase and work up trade with those people.

Mr. FESS. Has the gentleman made an investigation as to how much of the trade which has come to North America from South America goes first to Liverpool and then back again?

Mr. CLINE. No; I have not.

Mr. FESS. I understand there is a good deal of it.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLINE. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman has just referred to the important influence of language. Does the gentleman know how many of our consular and diplomatic representatives in South America speak the language of the country to which they are accredited?

Mr. CLINE. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that our Consular Service requires those parties to have some knowledge of the Spanish language, but the difficulty comes from the fact they do not have a sufficient force. For instance, England and Germany have at Buenos Aires, employed in the consular service, from 8 to 12 persons. It costs those countries, respectively, nearly $20,000 a year. We have employed there three persons at a small salary at the present time, but we expect, of course, to raise them to the position of an embassy and give those posts a larger force.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman know whether this is a fact—I have seen it currently reported in the press—that of the recent appointees to diplomatic positions in South America there was not one who spoke the language of the country to which he was accredited?

Mr. CLINE. No, sir; I do not know that. I do know, however, through what little investigation I have made in the State Department, that it is the rule in reference to applicants for such positions that they must be acquainted with the language of the country to which they are sent.

Mr. WILLIS. But the gentleman is speaking of the Consular Service, and I am now speaking of the Diplomatic Service. My information is that none of those who have recently been appointed to those positions speak the language of the place to which they are sent.

Mr. CLINE. That may be true.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] a little while ago in his address questioned my motives in making points of order that there was no quorum present and criticized me for doing so, and I think in view of those criticisms and such questioning of my motives here I have a right to make a personal explanation.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. To a personal explanation.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. A personal explanation is not in order in the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] wishes to state.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. He said it was a question of personal privilege.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I did, and stated it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Oklahoma that it is a matter that properly comes before the House.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Then I understand that a gentleman can be criticized and his address impugned in committee without any defense whatever on his part?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I never criticized or questioned the gentleman's motives.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to make his statement or ruling, which is that the rules amply provide for the protection of every Member. The right of the gentleman——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Paragraph 5 of Rule XIV, on page 321 of the Manual, says:

> If a Member is called to order for words spoken in debate, the Member calling him to order shall indicate the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk and read aloud to the House; but he shall not be held to answer, nor be subject to the censure of the House therefor, if further debate or other business has intervened.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I have no objection if the words are taken down.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Oklahoma be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] asks that the gentleman from Oklahoma be allowed to proceed for five minutes—not to come out of the time of either side.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Not to come out of anybody's time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman proposes to say anything about me, and if at the end of that time I desire to reply to him, I ask that courtesy.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have what time he wants in which to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] is recognized.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] saw fit a few moments ago to read me a lecture for my conduct here this afternoon in making points of order that there was not a quorum present. Now, I have no objection to the gentleman from Alabama criticizing me or any other gentleman in the House criticizing me at any time for my conduct or for my vote. But I would have taken this with a great deal more of grace, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman's record here for 10 years had been a record in the interest of the farming and laboring classes of this country.

Now, the gentleman says that I did not vote for the currency bill last September. That is true. But we all remember, Mr. Chairman, that after that currency bill had left the Democratic caucus and it was brought on the floor of the House, the Committee on Banking and Currency brought in a gold-standard amendment that was in violation of every Democratic platform ever written in this country, and foisted it on the Democratic Members of this House; and the gentleman from Alabama voted for the gold standard. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am not surprised at Republicans applauding a Democrat who votes for the gold standard.

The RECORD will show, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will go back to it, that a motion was made to recommit that bill with instructions and to incorporate a provision preventing the interlocking of directorates, and I am sure the gentleman from Alabama is acquainted with the Pujo report, which shows that the interlocking of directorates by the great financial institutions of this country puts into the hands of 112 men in this country more than twenty-two thousand million dollars of the capital of this country, and the gentleman voted against recommitting the bill with instructions to put that in the bill, in the face of the Democratic platform that promised that we would legislate on that subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that banking and currency bill did not suit me, and I said so at the time. It did not suit me because it did not take care of the farming and laboring classes of the country. A few of us attempted to put in that banking and currency act a provision that the bank should not loan money to be used in purchasing futures on staple farm products, and the gentleman from Alabama voted against that in caucus. When the banking and currency act was brought in here it only provided that farmers' paper should have a maturity of not more than 45 days. We fought that in caucus and extended that time to 90 days. It provided, when it was brought in here, that national banks should not loan money on farm land for more than 9 months. We fought it in caucus and extended that time to 1 year. The Members of this House who stood up for the farming and laboring classes in this country wanted that personal security extended to 6 months and they wanted the farm loans extended to 5 years. And in the Senate these extensions were made, and they are now in the bill. When the bill came back here from the Senate the gentleman from Oklahoma, my colleague [Mr. MURRAY], moved that we accept the Senate amendments. I voted for the motion and the gentleman from Alabama voted against it, and sent it to the committee, doubtless with the idea of striking out of the bill those beneficent provisions for the farmers and laborers of this country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: We pledged the people of this country, in our last platform, rural credits. We pledged them a bill of this kind. Is a platform molasses, made to catch flies?

A MEMBER. Yes! [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Or is it a covenant with the people that we intend to live up to?

A MEMBER. No! [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, that may be true. These gentlemen who say "No" and who say "Yes" may believe that, but I do not. I do not believe that the Democrats of this country believe that.

A MEMBER. Nor the people.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. And the people of this country, when they believe that any party—Democratic, Republican, Progressive, Bull Moose, or any other party—simply puts a provision in its platform to catch votes, like a platform of a railroad car, to get in on, and to be used no longer, that party will be scourged from power, and ought to be scourged from power. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, we ought to put through at this session of Congress a rural credits bill. It is more important than any other bill on this calendar. That is the reason I am making a fight. I am making a fight to live up to the platform pledges of the Democratic Party and to give the farmers and laborers of this country what we pledged them; and I will continue to make that fight until the final gavel sounds at the close of this session.

Mr. Chairman, unconsciously, I am sure, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is repeating a slander which has been sent out from Washington by a party whose name I can call, and whose name I challenge the Republican newspapers who have reproduced the article charging me with not voting on the banking and currency act to give the public. I have already stated the reasons why I did not vote for the banking and currency act, but I can add to those reasons; and since the gentleman from Alabama has seen fit to repeat on the floor of this House what was carried in the Republican papers of Oklahoma—the Oklahoma City Times, Tulsa World, and the Ardmore Statesman—these insinuations and slanders, I want to say to him that if he will refer to the RECORD and refresh his memory he will find that there were three roll calls on September 18, 1913, on the banking and currency bill, and these roll calls appear on pages 5503, 5504, 5505, and 5506 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date. The first roll call was on a provision to insert in the bill what is commonly known as the gold-standard amendment. The gentleman from Alabama, in the face of the history of the Democratic Party, which has declared from time immemorial against the gold standard, voted in favor of it. I voted against it.

And, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in this connection that there was a great deal of treachery about the way this gold-standard provision found its way into the banking and currency bill. The Banking and Currency Committee knew that they could not foist this on the Democrats of the House; therefore they did not dare put it in the bill in the committee nor did they dare attempt such an amendment in the caucus; but after the bill had left the caucus and had been reported to the House they brought in this amendment, without authority from the caucus and without knowledge on the part of the Democrats and the Progressives in the House, who stood for the people. They knew that with the aid of the stand-pat Republicans they could run it over us and forever restrict the circulating medium of this country to gold, thereby appreciating the value of gold and depreciating the value of the farmers' and laborers' products, for the products of the farmer and the laborer increase in proportion to the amount of circulating medium of the country.

The next proposition presented was a motion to recommit with instructions to the Banking and Currency Committee to amend the bill by incorporating a provision that no officer or director of any national bank, State bank, banking association, or trust company admitted to membership in a Federal reserve bank under the provisions of the act should be an officer or director of any other bank or financial corporation or institution admitted thereunder who was an officer or director of any national bank, State bank, or trust company which was not a member of a Federal reserve bank or who was a member of a firm or partnership of bankers engaged in the business of receiving deposits. This provision was commonly known as the "interlocking-directorate provision." I voted in favor of incorporating that provision, as will be seen from page 5505 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, and the gentleman from Alabama voted against it, and that, too, in the face of a platform pledge that we would do away with the interlocking of directorates and do away with a few men on Wall Street controlling all the money of this country. One hundred and twelve men, according to the Pujo report, control twenty-two thousand millions of dollars of the capital of this country.

I was then called to the telephone, and came back into the room when my name was called the second time, and it is true I did not vote at all. I was disgusted that the Democrats of the country should go body and soul over to the money power by the incorporation of the gold standard and the refusal to incorporate a provision against the interlocking of directorates that would prohibit a few millionaires from controlling the finance of our country.

I believed then as I believe now that the finances of the country is a governmental function that ought to be controlled by the Government in the interest of the people, and not by a few men in their own selfish interests. I am not ashamed of my record on that question; and the appointment of Mr. Paul M. Warburg, of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., of New York, on the Federal Reserve Board has not changed my views on the banking and currency act. If the gentleman will refer to the report on the Money Trust investigation and will read that report, beginning on page 77, he will find that Mr. Warburg is a member of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., who the committee report as being—one of the six great banking corporations that have done more than all others toward bringing about the concentration and control of the money and credit of the country—and he will find further that from 1907 to 1912 the firm of which Mr. Warburg is a member purchased security issues of corporations amounting to $530,862,000, and, in conjunction with the five Money Trust banks, issues amounting to $704,777,708, and that from 1897 to 1906 it purchased, with other banks, issues amounting to $821,289,000; that it is affiliated with the Fourth National Bank of New York City, with the Equitable Trust Co., National Bank of Commerce, United States Mortgage & Trust Co., National Park Bank, Bank of Manhattan County, Merchants' National Bank, Union Exchange National Bank, all of New York, and the First National Bank of Chicago, and the Title Guaranty & Trust Co., of New York; that it is also affiliated with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, Union Pacific Railroad, Southern Pacific Railroad, Chicago & North Western Railroad, Chicago & Alton Railroad, Eastern Illinois Railroad, Illinois Central Railroad, Pennsylvania Railroad, Wabash Railroad, Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad, Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, Delaware & Hudson Railroad, Hocking Valley Railroad, Missouri Pacific Railroad, New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad—and in passing I might remark that in the last few days we have heard a great deal about this railroad, about how it monopolized and purchased all the street railroads and electric lines in New England, and how it manipulated the stock and made millions for its officers at the expense of the traveling public—St. Louis & Southwestern Railroad, Wells-Fargo Express Co., Westinghouse Electric Manufacturing Co., Armour & Co., Baldwin Locomotive Works, Consolidated Coal Co., American Beet Sugar Co., American Telegraph & Telephone Co., Western Union Telegraph Co., Kansas City Railway & Light Co.; and that it, with the other banks, has foisted upon the people of the country—the unsuspecting purchasers—hundreds of millions, yes, billions, of dollars of stocks and bonds.

Mr. Chairman, I might say other things and call the gentleman's attention to other matters incorporated in that bill, but I will pass on to another subject.

The subcommittee of the House Banking and Currency Committee has reported to the full committee and has introduced in this House, through its chairman, what is denominated a rural-credit bill. I am very much interested in this subject because the great majority of the people whom I represent here are farmers and laborers—nearly 250,000 people—and regardless of the lecture of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], I shall continue to represent their interests on this floor, whether it pleases him or any other Member of this House. My people—farming and laboring classes of people—are paying interest rates all the way from 10 to 36 per cent. Any man who has studied the economics of any business knows that that business can not last long under this kind of a burden. I am fighting, therefore, to keep my people out of bankruptcy and to save them from ruin. A farm-credit bill that is a real farm-credit bill will aid them, and I propose to stand here and insist that no business be done in this House until they are afforded some relief from the burdens that they now bear unless a quorum is present at all times to vote me down. I do not believe that the bill reported by the subcommittee affords them any relief whatever. In the first place, it provides for private ownership and a dividend on the stock. This means that the business will be conducted for profit. I stand, on the contrary, for a Government-owned system of banks, conducted in the interest of the borrowers and not in the interest of the stockholders—a system run without profit that will afford the people the money they require to conduct their business at a reasonable rate of interest, not to exceed 5 per cent where it is secured by land, and not to exceed 6 per cent where it is secured by chattel property or personal indorsement. The bill as reported by the subcommittee makes no provision to take care of any class of people except those who own land. I will never agree to a bill that does not also take care of the tenant class of farmers who own no land.

President Wilson, after looking over the bill reported by the subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee, in an interview carried in the Washington Star of yesterday, stated that he could not approve the bill because it did not extend credit to the tenant farmers. I stand with the President and approve his views in this respect. The bill as reported places no limitation on the interest that can be charged, except the local rate in the different States of the Union. I will never agree to any bill that fixes a rate of interest on farm loans exceeding 5 per cent and on personal property and personal indorsements that exceeds 6 per cent. The bill does not provide against usury. I will never stand for a bill that does not have a provision in it denouncing usury. The bill provides, further, that no man can borrow except he be a stockholder in the banks. A man who is able to take stock in these banks for profit and in the hope of securing a dividend does not stand in great need of cheap money, because he is able to get money on his own responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize that I may be criticized for the position I take and for the fight I am making in the interests of the farming and laboring classes of this country, but I am responsible for my course. The farming and laboring people elected me to this position, and as long as I remain their representative in Congress I intend to stand here and fight for their interests, regardless of criticism from the gentleman from Alabama or from any other source. Mr. Chairman, the people whom I represent may be farmers and laborers, but there is no class of people in this Republic more intelligent, more brave, or more patriotic than they. I was born on a rented farm and raised up among these people. I know their wishes; and if I should falter or hesitate in this fight, which means so much to them, I would not be worthy the position with which they have honored me. Gentlemen can criticize and denounce me all they choose. I welcome it when I know, as I do in this case, that my fight is in the interest of the farmers and laborers of Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, we have had a long day and an arduous one, and I am now constrained to make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HEFLIN. Before the gentleman makes that point, I would like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] attacked my record and reflected on my motives, I ask for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to speak for five minutes, the time to be taken out of——

Mr. HEFLIN. No. That is nobody's time. That is the way time was granted to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The time to be added to the time allotted for general debate. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman on the other side if he has used up all his time?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I have 10 minutes left.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood it was the aim on the part of the gentlemen on the other side to expedite legislation, but now if we are going to have this continuous performance running along we shall never get through with general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I never criticized the motives of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON]. I have been rather amused at his labored defense of his performance here to-day.

The gentleman, hard pressed for arguments to sustain his position, accused me of voting for the gold standard. The proposition that was brought up in the bill to which he refers was in the nature of a recodification of the law already on the statute books, and it was simply inserting in the new law that which was already the law. It was thought by those high in authority in the administration that it ought to be retained in the new law, and that was done.

I supported a provision to recognize cotton-warehouse receipts and to give the farmers a longer time upon their loans. I am ready to support a rural-credits bill at this session of Congress, and I want the gentleman from Oklahoma to help us and not hinder us in reaching this bill.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; briefly.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will guarantee me that, I will make no further points of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not guarantee it; but I will say to the gentleman that if he will come with us and help push these other bills already on the calendar through, he will come very much nearer getting it than he will by antagonizing the Democratic Party in this House, to the delight of the Republican Party. The gentleman has noted, doubtless, that in every attack that he has made he has had applause from the Republican side, because they love to see any kind of a disturbance on the Democratic side. [Laughter on the Republican side.] They always applaud when they can get a row stirred up on this side. I have been in the service here a good long time. I have been fighting the great enemy of the people, the old stand-pat Republican Party [laughter on the Republican side], and I have never had that party to applaud me yet when I have been fighting the battles of the people here. [Applause.] So beware, my friend, when the Republicans applaud your attacks on the Democratic administration.

The gentleman from Oklahoma talked about keeping promises. The Democratic Party has done more in 12 months for the people than the Republican Party has done in 16 years. Do not be deceived; the people are grateful to our party, and they realize that we can not do everything in a day. Do not furnish the Republicans political material. Let them supply their own much-needed aid in this regard.

Let me tell you that the people of this country are with the Democratic administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let the Republicans criticize and abuse us, but let them find no evidence of Democratic dissension and Democratic discord in a time like this. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. We have enough now.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; look at the large number of Democrats here now and a mere handful of Republicans on that side. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, again I want to say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the course he is pursuing is not the wise course. Let us push legislation through this House and make the way certain for legislation on rural credits. Let us present a solid front to the fast-waning remnant of the Republican Party and do our duty as Democrats, and all will be well in the end. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, it has been about 12 months since the eastern railroads of the United States filed their applications for an increase in freight rates with the Interstate Commerce Commission and thus far no decision has been rendered, although the commission has had the information at hand to decide the application many months ago.

The proceedings of the commission in regard to holding hearings on the application of the railroads for increase in freight rates have been very informal and irregular. The entire membership of the commission should have heard the arguments for and against the increase of freight rates instead of only one of the commissioners presiding. In many instances none of the commissioners were present, only the stenographers.

In many of the courts throughout the country the judges can not hold up decisions longer than 60 days, whereas in the Interstate Commerce Commission there is no telling as to the length of time they might hold up decisions, and in many instances they have been held up for a period of two years or more. I dislike to say that the commission is incompetent, but I will say that they are derelict in their duty to the people of the United States in not deciding promptly the cases before them. In the case of the eastern railroads applying for an increase in freight rates it is so plain and evident that an increase must be granted on account of the increase in cost of materials and the increased allowances of their employees that the commission could have allowed the increases asked for and have gone on with the hearings. If, after the hearings, the commission was convinced that the previously granted increases were excessive, then they could have made the rates what the evidence convinced them were just and proper.

In July, 1913, the Interstate Commerce Commission decided the Terminal Rate case, but did not promulgate their decision until January, 1914. On December 15, 1913, the commission closed the railroads' side of the Freight Rate Increase case and adjourned hearings until January 15, 1914, when the shippers' side of the case was to be taken up. In January, 1914, the commission reopened the railroads' side of the case by submitting to them a number of questions. Many of the questions applied to the decision in the Terminal Rate case, and the information thus sought was already on file in the archives of the commission, and had been for many months. It was very improper for the commission to proceed with the hearings in the Freight Rate Increase case when they had not promulgated their decision in the Terminal Rate case until January, 1914, although said decision had been reached in July, 1913.

Mr. Chairman, during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 the eastern railroads increased their property investment $659,862,000. During the last fiscal year the gross earnings of these roads were $1,424,119,000, or $186,775,000 more than they were during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910. During the last fiscal year the operating expenses and taxes for the same roads amounted to $1,087,365,000, or $203,087,000 greater than they were in 1910; so that even though these railroads earned in gross during the last fiscal year $186,775,000 more than was earned during three years previous, the net result, after the payment of operating expenses and taxes, was actually $16,311,000 less than it was in 1910, notwithstanding the fact that over $659,000,000 additional had been spent in the meantime for additions, betterments, and equipment. [Applause.]

According to the figures of Mr. C. Stuart Patterson, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to the revenues and expenses of the carriers that are asking for an increase in freight rates, the statistics show enormous increases in operating expenses, decreases in total operating expenses, and an unprecedented decrease in operating income. According to Mr. Patterson's figures, the decrease in total operating revenues for the first seven months of the present fiscal year, as compared with the same period of the preceding year, was $6,995,529, the increase in total operating expenses $39,210,233, and net operating revenue decreased $46,205,762. For the first seven months of the present fiscal year taxes alone showed an increase of $2,244,000. The operating income of the carriers showed a total decrease of $51,026,935, or 22 per cent less than for the seven months of the preceding fiscal year of 1913, which is more than the advance they request of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

From the foregoing figures it is very evident that the increases applied for by the railroads should be granted. [Applause.] If the commission fails to grant the applications, it will indirectly affect about 25,000,000 people throughout the country engaged in various occupations and enterprises, and many additional persons will be thrown out of employment. The prosperity of the railroads is the prosperity of the country. At the present time we need 100,000 additional miles of railway in this country, and I feel certain that when the increase is granted the railroads will again begin the construction of additional lines and at the same time we will have renewed prosperity, instead of the stagnation that exists at the present time. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing several letters which I have received on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The letters are as follows:

Hon. JEFFERSON M. LEVY,

Hon. JEFFERSON M. LEVY,
Washington, D. C.

FRIEND LEVY: The various newspapers are quoting your remarks that you anticipated as soon as the Interstate Commerce Commission allowed the railroad companies an increase of freight rates that the business of this country would be more prosperous than it has ever been before. I fully agree with you that the main trouble with the country to-day is too much interference on the part of the Government and too little consideration as to the rights of the railroad companies by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we can not expect good times as long as the Interstate Commerce Commission disregards the rights of the railroad corporations, as they are the largest employers of help next to the farming interests, and good business with the railroads means good business for many concerns dependent upon them.

Railroads are owned by millions of people as stockholders and bondholders, and thousands of widows and orphans are dependent upon the income they derive from their investments on railroad securities. The Interstate Commerce Commission have more power than any European king or even the Czar of Russia, and instead of increasing their power their wings should be clipped and much of the power they now have should be taken away from them. Many people are of the belief that they are playing the stock market, and that there is more money in the market for them individually by manipulating the market than by granting the wishes of the people and allowing an increase of freight rates.

Congress has had many investigating committees appointed during the past few years, but the most important committee that could be appointed has not been made; that is, a committee to investigate the actions of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to their ignoring the wishes of the people.

With the best of wishes for your future success and prosperity, I am,

Most respectfully, yours,

H. S. DE FOREST.

MORRISTOWN CHAIR CO. (INC.),
Morristown, Tenn., March 17, 1914.

Hon. J. M. LEVY, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You are not our Representative, but we want to congratulate you on the stand you are taking in regard to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to let you know that millions of people are getting tired of unsettled business conditions, caused in a great measure by this commission.

This endless hearing of the shippers is useless, as everyone wants the lowest rate possible on the product in which he is interested. That is human nature.

The C. M. & St. P. episode is causing this commission to be criticized by many, and some have gone so far as to say they believe a part of it is dealing in stocks. While everything is being investigated or prosecuted, why not try them?

With best wishes for your success with the bills, I am,

Yours, very truly,

GEO. W. BAKER.

MIDDLETOWN, ORANGE COUNTY, N. Y., March 16, 1914.

Hon. JEFFERSON M. LEVY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I know of your immense correspondence and dislike very much to trouble you to read a note from me, but I certainly congratulate you upon the position you are taking in regard to the Interstate Commerce Commission. You are certainly on the right track, and one which will result in great benefit to the country. You should have many followers in this direction.

I am becoming very much disappointed in President Wilson's noninterference in this matter. He certainly must read that unless something is done by this Interstate Commerce Commission, as you suggest, we will not elect a Democratic Congressman, at least in the State of New York, in the coming campaign.

I might add that I was candidate for State senator in this—Gov. Odell's—district on the Democraitc ticket, of course, and you know what that means. A Democrat has very little show, and I was defeated. Yet I was on the stump all the time and took a very active part during the entire campaign in behalf of President Wilson. I told the people that his election meant prosperity, etc. I am quite embarrassed. It is anything but prosperity.

Again complimenting you on your course, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

THOMAS WATTS.

MORRISTOWN, TENN., March 18, 1914.

Hon. JEFFERSON M. LEVY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This town is full of people who are your friends. They are not confined to New York by any means The men composing this commission are, in my judgment, men of insignificant mental caliber; that is, I base my belief on their actions. I do not know any of them personally. I think you are on the right track. I think also that if you can't reach them in the near future they will burst with self-importance and dictatorial pomp, and the country will get a little relief in that way.

Yours, sincerely,

J. C. THOMPSON.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I understand from the gentleman's argument and from the figures he has given that he is much opposed to any increase in freight rates.

Mr. LEVY. Oh, no. I say that we ought to grant the increase now. We have granted the powers to a commission that does not attend to its business. Congress should take hold of it and advance the rates. Do we want to bankrupt the railroads?

Mr. RAKER. Does not the gentleman think that the railroads have been bearing hard enough on the people heretofore, sapping the very life out of the consumer?

Mr. LEVY. Oh, no; the consumers and the shippers are asking for the increase of rates. In 700 cases there is no objection at all. In the Toledo grain case the shippers ask for the increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a report on the resolution submitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a report and resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I submit the following resolution and report in reply to the gentleman from New York:

House resolution 492.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to report to the House of Representatives, for its information, all the facts within the knowledge of the Interstate Commerce Commission which show that said commission has in many cases failed to grant an increase in freight rates to the railroads where no objections to such increase have been filed and where the shippers in many instances have requested that such increase be granted on the ground that it was just and reasonable.

[House Report No. 586, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

INCREASE OF FREIGHT RATES ON RAILROADS.

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following adverse report to accompany House resolution 492:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred House resolution 492, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

The committee has heretofore declined to expedite the consideration of resolutions of this character to the exclusion of important business requiring the attention of the committee, because the committee had not recognized such resolutions as privileged under the rules. The Speaker, however, lately held that such a resolution is privileged, and the committee with pleasure bows to that ruling, and at its first meeting thereafter took action on the resolution mentioned, as hereinbefore stated.

The committee is unable to report this resolution with a favorable recommendation for several reasons; one is that we regard it as improper for Congress to interfere with the discretion and quasi judicial action of the commission in passing upon the question of rates. It is an independent body, the members of which are answerable to Congress and to the President for misconduct, but as a body sitting for the hearing and determination of causes it would be exceedingly reprehensible for Congress or the President or anybody else supposed to have and exercise influence to interfere in any way with the orderely proceeding of the commission to hear and adjudge such cases. It is assimilated strongly to a court in its functions as to the hearing and determination of justice and fairness of rates, and certainly ought not to be subjected to outside influence or inquiry. It will be observed that this resolution does not call for abstract facts appearing of record which physically could be examined and brought to the attention of Congress, but it relates entirely to matters on which the commission is expected to pass in its quasi judicial and entirely administrative capacity of determining and ordering rates, and certainly should be untrammeled and uninterfered with until final action is reached.

Second. The resolution is to all intents and purposes a complaint that railroad rates have not been increased by the commission and in a measure argues the justice and propriety of such increase. The committee respectfully submits that the commission was originally organized for the purpose of regulating railroad rates and practices and, if possible, requiring and securing fair, just, and reasonable rates for the public. The field of inquiry and usefulness covered by the commission is the entire territory of the United States. If it were true, as stated in the resolution, that shippers have consented in some cases to an advance in rates, it would furnish no reason to support this resolution, for collusion of shippers in certain cases for advances in rates can not bind the public nor move the commission in its action.

This committee has been for many years working to help the commission carry out the purposes of its creation, and we have not yet succeeded in reducing the general level of rates low enough to conform to the requirement that they should be just, reasonable, and fair. It may be that in some cases they are too low to be remunerative, but almost without exception in such cases that is true because the railroads have voluntarily made them so from improper motives to cut rates and compete at some points to the injury and loss of other points, where the before-mentioned loss to the railroad has been more than compensated for by high rates.

The railroads have been many times advised that if they would use a little policy and fairness in equalizing their treatment of different communities and different persons and cease to discriminate by charging a high rate to one town and a low rate to its competitor, give everybody a fair deal and cease to discriminate in favor of or against anybody they would find the general level of rates would be satisfactory to the public and remunerative to the carriers, and they would find universal friendship for them existing among the people, and they would find a perfect willingness among the people and a readiness on the part of the commission and Congress to permit them to raise rates that were really found to be too low, but the committee declines to demand an increase of rates made abnormally low on the initiative of the carrier until the rates abnormally high are reduced, or a distinct purpose expressed that the two actions shall take place simultaneously.

The committee doubts not that in every congressional district there are points where rates unjustly high are maintained at which the suffering shippers would rise in outrage and remonstrate if carriers were allowed either a special raise at other points or a horizontal increase at all points. The committee respectfully declines to urge the commission directly or indirectly to diverge from its proper course and conduct to increase rates on particular lines and at particular points until something like general equality and fairness can be secured throughout the country. As long as the carriers infuriate business men at a particular point by hauling freight through in both directions to distant points beyond at lower rates than they will stop and deliver the same class of freight in the town discriminated against, they come with poor grace to ask this committee and Congress to prod the commission into hurrying an increase in rates anywhere. Let them act fairly before asking for relief. The carriers everywhere ought to be allowed to make enough income to provide for the upkeep of the roads, safety appliances, proper service, and a reasonable income on the capital actually and honestly invested in the transportation of persons and property, and the committee has no doubt of the general willingness of the public that such should be done, and if the carriers would study the question of fair treatment of all persons and the different communities and show a disposition to equalize their treatment of such places and persons they would find no trouble in securing the consent of Congress and the people to improve their systems, provide all facilities for travel and safety, and still realize a reasonable income.

The committee therefore recommends that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, in view of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] in reference to the relations of this country and Latin-American countries I ask unanimous consent to incorporate as a part of my remarks a statement prepared at my request by Mr. John Barrett, the able and efficient Director General of the Pan American Union on this subject. I believe Mr. Barrett is the best posted man on the feelings and affairs of our southern neighbors in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin now use some of his time?

Mr. COOPER. Will not the gentleman from Virginia consent to adjourn? We will not take much time to-morrow.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. How much time has the gentleman remaining?

Mr. COOPER. I have half an hour left.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman consume it himself?

Mr. COOPER. No; I have three speakers. It will take only half an hour.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that there is a quorum here, and if I were not disposed to grant the gentleman's request I would not be in a position to refuse.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, my colleague, Mr. HUMPHREY, has been suddenly called from the Chamber. I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that his colleague, Mr. HUMPHREY, may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. RAKER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FINLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15762, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, I file herewith a privileged report (No. 677) on resolution 256, the so-called Mann resolution, respecting campaign contributions, accompanied by a substitute resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri files a privileged report on House resolution 256, which is referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

REVENUE CUTTERS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 4377, to construct certain revenue cutters, as amended by the House, with Senate amendments thereto, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to permit that to go over until to-morrow. It is very late in the day, and the matter might provoke some debate.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 15, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast given to us a vision fair and beautiful of the highest form of human civilization. Thou hast united us in heart and mind to build a temple of justice in conformity to the Divine revelation. Thou dost say unto us as Thou hast said to Thy people in the ancient time. See that Thou make all things according to the pattern showed to Thee in the mount. We desire to apply the vision beautiful to that which we build for human happiness and for human prosperity, remembering that conformity to the original plan insures the strength, the beauty, and the permanency of our institutions. To this end do Thou guide us in all our work. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

HARBOR TONNAGE AND CONSTRUCTION OF LOCKS (S. DOC. NO. 483).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in further response to a resolution of the 9th ultimo, a statement showing the cost of operating the locks constructed by the United States and the total tonnage passing through each. The Chair is not advised what Senator introduced the resolution or what he would desire to have done with the report.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I suggest that the communication be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. BURTON. What was the object for which the report was called? What committee called for it?

Mr. O'GORMAN. My impression is that it was called for by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals; but I will modify my suggestion, and instead of requesting that it be referred to that committee I ask that the communication be printed as a document, for the use of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. GORDON W. NELSON.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate for just a moment regarding an emergency bill. On the 6th of June the graduates from the Naval Academy at Annapolis will receive their diplomas. Among them is a young man named Gordon W. Nelson, who has not yet been naturalized as a citizen. A few days ago we passed a bill permitting his graduation on that date with the understanding that he would become naturalized by January 1 next. Through some inadvertence the date was fixed for January 1 next when it should have been July 1 of next year.

From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5552) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Gordon W. Nelson," approved May 9, 1914, and I submit a report (No. 523) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act for the relief of Gordon W. Nelson," approved May 9, 1914, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to commission, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Gordon W. Nelson an ensign in the United States Navy on the date of his graduation after the four years' course at the Naval Academy, to take rank as an ensign with the other members of his class according to their standing as determined by their final multiples for the four years' course at the Naval Academy: Provided, That unless the said Gordon W. Nelson becomes a citizen of the United States on or before July 1, 1915, he shall on said date cease to be an officer of the Navy."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VESSELS IN COASTWISE AND FOREIGN TRADE.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On April 17 the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] submitted a concurrent resolution (No. 23) directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and report facts regarding the ownership, organization, operation, and rates of vessels and steamship lines transporting freight between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and it was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I am directed by that committee to report a Senate resolution (S. Res. 364) as a substitute for the concurrent resolution of the Senator from Texas, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the resolution goes to the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

STAR SPANGLED BANNER CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the joint resolution be stated.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 148) authorizing the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to participate through their accredited diplomatic agents to the United States in the National Star Spangled Banner Centennial Celebration was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say there is no appropriation called for by the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. It must be referred to a committee. If it were simply a Senate resolution, it might be considered at this time and without reference to a committee; but it is a joint resolution and must be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Very well. It is, however, such a harmless measure I thought it might possibly be acted upon at once.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I suggest that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment providing that hereafter the laws relating to annual leave in the Navy shall apply to classified civil-service per diem employees of the clerical, drafting, inspection, messenger, and watch forces at navy yards, naval stations, and other offices or stations under the Navy Department, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In this week's issue of the Saturday Evening Post, of Philadelphia, there was published an article expressing certain views of David Jayne Hill, who was Assistant Secretary of State under John Hay at the time of the negotiation of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I request that the article may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MEANING OF THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

(By David Jayne Hill.)

Without touching on the expediency of either affirming or surrendering such rights as the United States may possess in the Panama Canal, it may be useful at this time to inquire what are the respective rights of the United States and Great Britain under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty: In 1850 the occupation by Great Britain of territory in the vicinity of a possible future canal connecting the Atlantic and the Pacific led to the negotiation of a treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed on April 19 of that year, which contained the following provisions:

"The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America," and so on.

So long as this convention remained in force—that is, down to the year 1900—it was impossible for either Great Britain or the United States to build an isthmian canal over which it could, without a violation of the treaty, exercise such rights of control and defense as would justify the expenditure of the cost of construction by either nation.

Meanwhile, under rights obtained from Colombia, a French company began, but afterwards abandoned, the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

In 1900 the Government of the United States desired to construct an isthmian canal for the purpose of connecting its Atlantic and Pacific coasts by a waterway through which its ships of war and its domestic commerce might be transferred from ocean to ocean. This was to be an American canal, constructed and controlled by the Government of the United States. The obstacle to procedure was the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, by which the United States was solemnly bound not to exercise the control it now desired to exercise.

The abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty: The task was intrusted to the Secretary of State, Mr. John Hay, to open negotiations with Great Britain for the purpose of liberating the Government of the United States from its agreement with Great Britain, in order that it might be free to proceed with the construction of a canal under its own exclusive control.

Would Great Britain agree to release the United States from the then existing obligations? That was the question which Secretary Hay was called on to face. On the one hand, Great Britain might be reluctant to permit the United States to construct and control a waterway between the two oceans, through which American ships might at all times pass freely and from which British ships might sometimes be excluded.

On the other hand, Great Britain, as the greatest of maritime powers, might profit greatly by the construction of such a canal; and there was the possibility that the United States, whose position in the Western Hemisphere had been profoundly modified in the 50 years that had elapsed since the signing of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, might consider it expedient to denounce that treaty, on the ground that treaties, even when alleged to be perpetual, are morally binding only rebus sic stantibus, and cease to be so when conditions have essentially changed.

In the conduct of the negotiations Mr. Hay discovered that Great Britain was deeply interested in the construction of a canal at the expense of the United States, and would readily consent to it on condition that the general principle of neutralization, which had been definitely specified in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, should be recognized in a new convention.

Accordingly a new treaty was signed on February 5, 1900, designed to take the place of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, in which it was agreed that a canal might be constructed "under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares."

The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty: Though the treaty of February 5, 1900, released the Government of the United States from some of the obligations of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it did not release it from all.

In the second article it was declared:

"The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which convention is hereby superseded, adopt, as the basis of such neutralization, the following rules."

The rules, substantially as embodied in the Suez Canal convention, signed by nine powers in 1888, then follow. The first one reads:

"The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations, on terms of entire equality; so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions and charges of traffic, or otherwise."

The seventh rule reads:

"No fortification shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder."

Evidently here, as in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, Great Britain shared with the United States the power to determine the conditions under which the canal should be used. It was distinctly agreed that all nations, without qualification of any kind, and therefore plainly including the United States, were to be treated on terms of entire equality with the United States.

The language is plain and explicit, and can have no other meaning. So complete is the condominium in the control of the canal that Great Britain in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty still possessed and exercised the right to forbid the fortification of the canal, as well as to share on terms of entire equality all the privileges of the United States, both in war and peace.

The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty: Though it is well known that the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was not ratified by the Senate of the United States and was returned to Secretary Hay with several proposed amendments, the language of that treaty has so impressed itself on the memory of many persons that they persist in quoting its words as constituting the present obligations of the United States, unmindful of the fact that it was never ratified.

It is therefore of the highest importance to a comprehension of this subject that we should not only distinguish between the unratified treaty of February 5, 1900, and the treaty of November 18, 1901, which was duly ratified and is now in force, but that we should closely follow the steps of the transition from the one to the other by which the relations of the two Governments were radically modified.

Without encumbering this brief exposition with the discussion of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty before the committee of the Senate, it may be sufficient to point out the nature of the modifications actually adopted, with the reasons for making them.

When the Senate declined to ratify without amendment his first treaty, Secretary Hay reopened the negotiations with Great Britain on the understanding that the canal was to be exclusively American; that the right of fortification was not to be denied; and that neutralization as a general principle could not be interpreted as excluding the owners of an object from unlimited control over it, so long as all neuters were subjected to equal treatment. Great Britain and all others were to be treated with strict equality, but the United States was to have a free hand in the management of its own property.

In pursuance of this purpose the draft of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty withdrew from the obscurity of a merely parenthetical clause the statement that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded, and brought to the front as the first article the plain declaration:

"The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850."

It is therefore useless to look back of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November 18, 1901, for any light on the present rights and treaty relations of the United States and Great Britain. So far as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty are concerned, they have no existence and no effect. The rights of the two countries respecting the canal are therefore to be determined solely by an interpretation of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which alone is still in force.

Happily we have clear and authentic written evidence of the intentions of both sides in this negotiation. In communicating the new treaty to the Senate for ratification Mr. Hay says:

"The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it. Under these circumstances, and considering that now, by the new treaty, Great Britain is relieved of all responsibility and burden of maintaining its neutrality and security, it was thought entirely fair to omit the prohibition that 'No fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent.'"

There are then, from Mr. Hay's point of view, no limitations whatever on the enjoyment by the United States of "all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal," as provided for in the second article of the new treaty. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty casts no shadow on the new convention, which is based on a new conception of the relations of the two Governments to the canal.

That the British Government took the same view is evident from the difference between the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties and the statements of Lord Lansdowne, the British minister of foreign affairs, in his communications to Lord Pauncefote.

The changes in the treaty as ratified: Lord Lansdowne's memorandum for the instruction of Lord Pauncefote, dated August 3, 1901, reveals how completely the British Government had modified its point of view since the negotiations began.

"In form," says Lord Lansdowne, "the new draft differs from the convention of 1900, under which the high contracting parties, after agreeing that the canal might be constructed by the United States, undertook to adopt certain rules as the basis on which the canal was to be neutralized. In the new draft the United States intimate their readiness 'to adopt' somewhat similar rules as the basis of the neutralization of the canal. It would appear to follow that the whole responsibility for upholding these rules, and thereby maintaining the neutrality of the canal, would henceforth be assumed by the Government of the United States. The change of form is an important one; but in view of the fact that the whole cost of construction of the canal is to be borne by that Government, which is also to be charged with such measures as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder, His Majesty's Government are not likely to object to it."

In brief, the rules for the use of the canal, instead of being laid down, as in the first treaty, by the United States and Great Britain jointly, in this new treaty are now to be laid down by the United States alone; the reason for this being that the cost of constructing, maintaining, and defending the canal is now to be borne solely by the United States. The bilateral agreement becomes a unilateral regulation. In exchange for the added burdens assumed by the United States, Great Britain surrenders all rights in the canal except those explicitly accorded under the rules adopted by the United States.

This radical change in the ground conception of the treaty seemed to Lord Lansdowne to require a corresponding change in the phraseology of the rules. Accordingly, in the draft of the treaty sent by the British foreign office to Lord Pauncefote, Lord Lansdowne proposed to change the expression in the first rule from—

"The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations, on terms of entire equality; so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions and charges of traffic, or otherwise"—

To the form—

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules, on terms of entire equality; so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation so agreeing," and so on.

The significance of this change is evident. The rules in question were now to be adopted by the United States alone. The canal was not to be thrown open to "all nations," but only to "all nations which shall agree to observe these rules." Not only so, but the expression "in time of war as in time of peace," which apeared in the first treaty, is now dropped, thus giving the United States in time of war the right, if necessary, to close the canal, even to those naticns that agree to observe the rules laid down by the United States.

Clearly the United States Government in this new treaty occupies an entirely different position from the one it occupied in the previous treaty. It now possesses the right not only to fortify the canal but to close the canal in time of war. It is recognized as sole proprietor, and as such is empowered not only to adopt rules but by its own means and at its own cost to enforce the observance of them.

What, then, is the position in the new form of the treaty of all other nations, Great Britain included? "All nations which shall agree to observe these rules," now adopted by the United States alone, and no others, are, according to Lord Lansdowne, to enjoy the use of the canal. A distinction is here made that did not appear in the first treaty. In the first treaty the United States and Great Britain together adopted rules that opened the canal to "all nations, on terms of entire equality." In the second treaty the United States alone adopts the rules; and, as sole owner of the canal, offers terms of entire equality to all nations that shall agree to observe them.

Does the equality here referred to mean equality with the Government of the United States or equality among those agreeing to observe the rules? This is, without doubt, the critical point in the interpretation of the treaty, and it is necessary to proceed with extreme caution and absolute freedom from prejudice of any kind.

It would appear that the right to fortify the canal and to adopt rules for its use, with the power of closing it in time of war for purposes of defense, places the Government of the United States in a position quite different from that which it occupied when all these prerogatives were denied. The consideration offered by the United States to Great Britain for these new advantages was the assumption of the whole burden of maintaining and defending the canal as a piece of national property, thus relieving and discharging Great Britain from any obligation whatever, except observance of the rules.

A close examination shows that not one of the rules the nations were to agree to observe could be regarded as applying to the owner of the canal; so that the expression "all nations which shall agree to observe these rules," can hardly be regarded as including the United States.

The purpose and character of the rules seem to forbid such inclusion. They are almost exclusively prohibitions that could not well apply to the United States as sole proprietor of the canal, whose whole interest would be to secure the observance of the rules and could not in any way be promoted by violating them—such as blockading the canal; committing acts of hostility within it; the revictualing of belligerent vessels; delay in transit; the treatment of prizes of war; the embarkation or debarkation of troops and munitions of war, and so on; and the occupation of waters adjacent to the canal by belligerent vessels—all of which relate to acts interfering with the control of the canal. Such rules have from their very nature no application to the United States, which, therefore, can not fairly be regarded as included in the expression, "all nations which shall agree to observe these rules."

We have, then, apparently two classes of powers designated in the provisions of this treaty: (1) The sole builder, owner, and controller of the canal, on the one hand, and (2) the nations that agree to observe the rules it has adopted, on the other. Does the United States consent in this treaty to extend to other nations entire equality with itself in the use of the canal, or only entire equality among themselves as equal and neutral powers?

The answer to this question is to be found in the statements relating to the effect of the treaty by those who commented on it at the time when it was negotiated. Lord Lansdowne, in his instructions to Lord Pauncefote, states very clearly his reason for changing "all nations" into "all nations which shall agree to observe these rules." His reason is—with the new conception of the treaty as giving to the United States complete control of the canal, thus making it exclusively American—that Great Britain would be placed at a disadvantage if all nations, without distinction, were to enjoy the privileges of the canal without any obligation to observe the rules.

"The omission of the words under which this country"—Great Britain—"became jointly bound to defend the neutrality of the canal, and the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty," Lord Lansdowne admits, "would materially diminish the obligations of Great Britain." "This," he adds, "is a most important consideration." "But," he continues, "having assumed the whole burden of defending the canal, the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war or apprehended war. Great Britain alone, in spite of her vast possessions on the American Continent and the extent of her interests in the East, would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action or from taking measures to secure her interests in and near the canal," though other powers not bound by the treaty would be free to take such action as they pleased.

"I would therefore suggest," he concludes, "the insertion, in rule 1, after 'all nations,' of the words 'which shall agree to observe these rules.' This addition will impose on the other powers the same self-denying ordinance as Great Britain is desired to accept, and will furnish an additional security to the neutrality of the canal, which it will be the duty of the United States to maintain."

What, then, is the substance of this self-denying ordinance on the part of Great Britain and this new burden assumed by the United States? Is it not the complete and unrestricted surrender of the control of the canal to the one power that takes the place of the two powers which before acted jointly, so that all other powers must agree to observe its rules on a plane of equality among themselves?

The Government of the United States objected to requiring all nations desiring the use of the canal to agree to observe its rules, on the ground that such an agreement would make those nations parties to the contract and thus give them contract rights in the canal. Mr. Hay proposed to change the reading of Lord Lansdowne's suggestion to "all nations observing these rules"; thus preserving the distinction already made plain in Lord Lansdowne's amendment between the nation adopting and the nations observing the rules, but without making them parties to the contract.

The question still remains, Did the assumption of the full control of the canal by the United States in any way affect the pledge of the United States Government in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty to accord to all nations terms of entire equality with itself?

The change in the relations between the high contracting parties expressed in the new treaty seems to imply a change in this respect also; and Lord Lansdowne appears to have thought it did, for he proposed the insertion in the new treaty of the words, now for the first time suggested, "such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

If it was clearly understood that the United States and all nations observing the rules were to be subject to identical conditions and charges of traffic, would there have been any occasion to demand of the United States that these should be just and equitable? Could the United States Government, on the assumption that "entire equality" applies to itself and other nations, have any motive for imposing conditions and charges of traffic that were not just and equitable on its own citizens?

This new insertion apparently implies the conviction that entire equality with the United States was no longer, as in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, a prerogative of the other powers, including Great Britain; and that the only way to guard against excesses by the United States was not, as might otherwise be expected, to write into the treaty the simple words, "no other conditions or charges of traffic are to be demanded than those paid by vessels of the United States," but, instead, the far feebler proviso, quite meaningless if entire equality were already accorded, "such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

Undoubtedly Great Britain was, to use Lord Lansdowne's expression, making a "self-denying ordinance." The new treaty was radically different from the old. The compensation to Great Britain, however, was twofold. Without these changes the canal would probably never be built, and Great Britain was desirous that it should be built; but, in addition, Great Britain was relieved of responsibilities by placing the control exclusively in the hands of the United States.

Could Great Britain expect, under these circumstances, to obtain entire equality in all the advantages of the canal? What compensation in that case would the United States receive for assuming not only the cost of construction but the responsibilities Great Britain thus evaded?

If the transaction is to be esteemed a fair bargain, such as should preserve the honor of both nations—and it is difficult to see how the honor of one can be involved without involving the honor of the other—it was just that the United States should receive some compensation for undertaking single handed to open a great waterway between the oceans that all nations observing its rules should use on equal terms. This was duly recognized by Lord Lansdowne, and there is not a word in the entire correspondence that is not inspired by a spirit of equity on both sides.

It would be as dishonorable to interpret unjustly the meaning of this treaty, and to insist that one side never really gave up anything, as to have made the treaty itself dishonorable or dishonoring to either side. In authorizing the signature of the treaty, as finally agreed on, Lord Lansdowne, in his final instructions to Lord Pauncefote, reverts to the words "all nations" and Mr. Hay's change in the form he had suggested, by remarking:

"His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers."

It would seem absurd to claim for Great Britain all that was voluntarily surrendered in her self-denying ordinance. Her rights appear thereby to have been reduced to the use of the canal on terms of equality with all nations observing the rules, with the added proviso that "such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable." All other rights in the canal are accorded by the treaty now in force to the Government of the United States, whose only duties to foreign nations are defined in the following paragraph:

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions and charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

The principle of neutralization unaffected: It was not intended that these changes in the treaty should affect the general principle of neutralization; and Mr. Hay, in recognition of the concessions made by Great Britain in the treaty of November 18, 1901, voluntarily proposed, and it was formally agreed in the fourth article, that no change of territorial sovereignty should affect the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

Since the ratification of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States has acquired by purchase from the Republic of Panama the right to exercise sovereign authority over the Canal Zone and the adjacent waters within the 3-mile limit; but this in no way affects the general principle of neutralization.

It is important, however, to comprehend the meaning of the term "neutralization" and the powers implied in the control of neutralized territory. Belgium, Switzerland, and Luxemburg are neutralized States; but their domestic concerns are in no way affected by this fact. Their duty consists solely in maintaining and defending their neutrality as between foreign powers. Their sovereign rights are in no way abridged. Within their own territory all of these rights remain intact.

No other power has a right to interfere with the relation between their treasuries and their domestic commerce. They are under a solemn obligation, voluntarily assumed, to treat other powers alike, so far as privileges within their territory are concerned; and especially not to permit their territory to be used as a military base or source of supplies for belligerents. This is precisely what the Government of the United States is pledged to do in respect to all nations observing the rules of neutralization adopted by the United States, namely, to furnish equal treatment and equal service in the canal.

If it were contended that the Government of the United States should enjoy no privileges in the canal other than those possessed by the nations observing its rules, there would be no historic example of neutralization and no intelligible definition of the term on which such a contention could be based. This contention would impose on the builders of the canal such servitude to noncontractants as was never yet imposed by any power on the owner of any neutralized object.

What, under that interpretation, would become of the agreement in the second article, that "the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal"?

It is true that all these rights are subject to the provisions of the present treaty; but they are not subject to theories and definitions not in harmony with these provisions, and they can not be in any way legally limited, except by the clear and express stipulations of the treaty itself.

It has been claimed as a restriction on these rights that the preamble of the treaty now in force expressly states that its purpose is "to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention"; and that therefore article 8 of that treaty is still in force.

A careful examination of the article in question shows that this can not possibly be the case; and that it is merely the general principle of neutralization, and not at all the specific form of neutralization presented in that article, which the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty is designed not to impair.

Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty contemplates the construction of a canal by neither Government, but by some company to be formed for that purpose, under the protection of both Governments. The canal is, in return for this equal protection, to be "open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms."

Both Governments are pledged not to exercise any control over this tertium quid. Suppose, then, such a company had built the canal, would there be any doubt about its right to pass its own ships freely through its own waterway? Would there be any impairment of the general principle of neutralization so long as all the protectors of the canal were equally served?

The difference between the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty consists precisely in this: In the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the United States and Great Britain were joint protectors of a tertium quid, while in the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States Government becomes, by a new and special agreement with Great Britain, both the sole owner and the sole protector of a canal built entirely at its own expense, while Great Britain ceases to bear any burden or accept any responsibility as protector of the canal.

That the right to equal treatment agreed on in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is based solely on participation in this obligation to protect the canal is evident from the last words of the article in question.

The article reads: "* * * shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

With the falling away of this protection, which in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was still joint between the United States and Great Britain, and was to be shared by other powers also, disappears entirely the specific form of neutrality embodied in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; and only the general principle, as already defined, remains, namely, that the owner grants entire equality to all nations observing the rules.

The removal of all ambiguities: If it be claimed that the language of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty is ambiguous, and that, therefore, the broadest possible construction should be placed on it, there is a very simple method of ending all controversy regarding the obligations of the treaty.

Let it be assumed that the Government of the United States is in honor bound to treat the vessels of all nations precisely as it treats its own, what results from this concession? If such conditions and charges of traffic are to be just and equitable, it is proper that every gross ton of shipping passing through the canal should bear its due proportion of the total interest charge and cost of maintenance, operation, and defense of the canal.

If it be a point of honor on account of the obligations of the treaty for the Government of the United States to accord to the vessels of all nations the same treatment that is accorded to its own vessels, it is also a point of honor for all nations availing themselves of the use of the canal to make good to the Treasury of the United States their share of the cost of the service rendered.

It would therefore be fitting for the Government of the United States, if this construction is to be placed on the treaty, to add a rule requiring the nations using the canal to pledge themselves, as a condition of enjoying its benefits, to pay from their respective treasuries such sums as may be necessary to meet any deficit in the annual budget of the canal, in proportion to the gross tonnage of the vessels sailing under their respective flags.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I make a further and similar request regarding the views of Chandler P. Anderson, who was Solicitor of the State Department under Mr. Knox, which appeared in the Washington Post under date of April 19, 1914.

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHANDLER P. ANDERSON EXPLAINS NEGLECTED PHASE OF TOLLS ISSUE.

[Washington Post, April 19, 1914.]

The discussion of the rights of the United States under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 has been devoted principally to the consideration of the question of whether or not the exemption of American coasting vessels from the payment of the tolls which are imposed on the vessels of other nations is a "discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise," in contravention of the provisions of article 3 of the treaty.

This exemption has been, and may well be, justified on the ground that it is not a discrimination against any other nation or its citizens or subjects, inasmuch as the vessels of no other nation are permitted under the laws of the United States to compete with the vessels of the United States in its coastwise trade, and when there is no competition there can be no discrimination. In stating this proposition it is assumed that the exemption is intended to be limited to vessels engaged in the bona fide coastwise trade of the United States from which foreign vessels are excluded, and to the exclusion from which no objection has been or can be made by any foreign nation.

But whatever may be said on this point, it must be remembered that this contention is only a secondary part of the interpretation of the treaty, hitherto insisted on by the Government of the United States, which is that the rules adopted by the United States under article 3 of the treaty, insuring that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality," etc., do not apply in any way to the vessels of war or of commerce of the United States.

If this interpretation is justified, then no question of discrimination or inequality of treatment in favor of American vessels of war or vessels of commerce, whether engaged in coastwise or foreign trade, can be raised by any other nation under the treaty. It is surprising, therefore, that in this discussion so little attention has been paid to the fundamental question underlying this whole controversy, which is whether or not the rules adopted by the United States under article 3 of this treaty "as the basis of neutralization of the canal" were intended to impose restrictions upon the use of the canal by the United States as well as by other nations.

The United States has adopted six rules in article 3 of this treaty, the last five of which relate to the use of the canal by belligerents in time of war. Secretary Hay stated in the history of these negotiations, which he submitted to the Senate with this treaty, that in case the United States became a belligerent it had "the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent and to protect it and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary."

That these rules relating to belligerents do not apply to the United States always has been and still is the view held by the Government of the United States. The correctness of this view also has been admitted and accepted by Great Britain, as appears from the statement in Sir Edward Grey's note of November 14, 1912, that "Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government does not question its title to exercise belligerent rights of its protection."

This right was not questioned by Great Britain even before the United States acquired title to the Canal Zone, as appears from former Ambassador Choate's recently published letter of October 2, 1901, in which he says, speaking of Lord Lansdowne, that he "gives us an American canal, ours to build as and where we like, to own, control, and govern on the sole condition of its being always neutral and free for the passage of the ships of all nations on equal terms, except that if we get into a war with any nation we can shut its ships out and take care of ourselves."

Obviously the last five of these six rules are not rules which the United States is required to apply to itself, and they must apply only to other nations.

It follows, therefore, as a matter of course, that in adopting the first rule by which the United States guarantees that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules,' the United States did not intend that this clause should apply to itself, for, as above shown, the rules to be observed are rules 2 to 6, none of which were understood by the United States or Great Britain as imposing any restrictions upon the use of the canal by the United States.

In other words, the United States has adopted six rules for the neutralization of the canal. In the first one of these rules the United States undertakes that the canal shall be free and open on equal terms to the vessels of all nations observing these rules, and the rules to be observed are the five rules which follow, regulating the use of the canal by belligerents, and therefore having no application to the United States. It is only in consequence of the observance of these rules that the vessels of other nations become entitled to equal treatment, and the United States alone of all nations assumes any obligation for the enforcement of these rules, and has the right to exclude the vessels of other nations from the use of the canal upon their failure to observe these rules, namely, rules 2 to 6.

It seems perfectly clear, therefore, that inasmuch as, for the reasons above stated, the United States is not required by the treaty to itself observe the rules restricting the use of the canal by belligerents, the United States consequently can not be regarded as one of the nations included in the phrase in rule 1, "all nations observing these rules," to which nations alone the provisions of rule 1, requiring equality of treatment, apply.

CHANDLER P. ANDERSON.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On May 14, 1914:

S. 540. An act for the relief of Joseph Hodges.

On May 15, 1914:

S. 4158. An act to reduce the fire limit required by the act approved March 4, 1913, in respect to the proposed Federal building at Salisbury, Md.

IMPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, some time ago a motion was made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] to reconsider the vote of the Senate by which a bill to exclude the importation of convict-made goods was referred to the Committee on Manufactures. I had left the city on account of illness when that motion was made, and the Senator from Maryland kindly requested that the motion should go over until I returned. I should like now to have that motion taken up and disposed of this morning.

The Senate will doubtless recall that the bill in question is a House bill. When it came over and was laid before the Senate I asked that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, to which committee an exactly similar Senate bill had been previously referred, and upon which the committee had made a favorable report, and which bill is now on the calendar. I asked that the House bill be referred to the same committee. Some Senator objected to that reference, contending that the bill should go to the Finance Committee; thereupon I moved to refer the bill to the Committee on Manufactures. That motion prevailed. Some two days afterwards the Senator from Maryland entered his motion to reconsider, which motion is still pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the motion referred to by the Senator from Missouri? The Secretary will state the motion.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] moved to reconsider the action of the Senate agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] referring to the Committee on Manufactures the bill (H. R. 14330) to prohibit the importation and entry of goods, wares, and merchandise made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, or made in whole or in part from materials which have been made in whole or in part or in any manner manipulated by convict or prison labor.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I should like to say on this subject that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], being unwell and desirous of going away, he made the request that this bill be referred to the Committee on Manufactures. As a matter of courtesy more than any other reason I voted in favor of his motion. A day or two afterwards it was called to my attention that this was somewhat a reversal of methods and that it involved a very large question. As a similar matter of courtesy I then moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred.

The Senate has only to read the title of this bill to see what a remarkable scope the measure has. Not only does it prohibit the importation and entry of goods wherein the merchandise is made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, but it covers articles made in whole or in part from material which has been made in whole or in part or in any manner manipulated by prison or convict labor.

Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that the field which is covered as indicated merely by the caption of the bill is almost unlimited. If the matter of the reconsideration of our tariff system is to be taken up at this stage of the session, it ought to be taken up by the committee which has already so creditably considered that great subject. The general purpose of the bill seems good. The Senate should be advised by the usual committee, one especially familiar with the tariff schedules, what the effect of this measure will be before acting upon the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I only wish to say a word in addition to what has been said by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE].

The scope of this bill is not at all limited to goods manufactured by convict, prison, or pauper labor; but if the original raw material in any way was touched, I might almost say, by prison, convict, or pauper labor, the product is excluded. If anything it is wrapped in was remotely touched by such labor, it is excluded. If anything that it is boxed in was touched by such labor, it is excluded. I suggested when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] moved that the bill go to the Committee on Manufactures that the Committee on Finance ought to investigate the bill and let us know how far-reaching it would be.

To illustrate, take our chemicals that we must buy from Germany in large part in connection with our dyes in this country. I understand that nearly all of them have some ingredients where the original raw material was mined by convict labor. To what extent would it exclude our dyes, our chemicals, essential to so many lines of manufacture? To what extent would it exclude cotton bagging? To what extent would it exclude bagging used for grain and wool? I do not know. I have had the suggestion brought to my attention by the Treasury Department; I have seen a letter from the First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Hamlin, indicating that it might be infinitely more far-reaching than any Senator for a moment would wish. It was for this reason that I thought the bill should go to the Committee on Finance, which has experts who have been studying the tariff question, and who are in a position to follow out the subject and to furnish to the Senate information that could not properly be expected to come from the Committee on Manufactures.

It is really a problem that involves the whole tariff question. Almost every schedule of the tariff is involved. If we are to rely for information to help us determine what we are doing, we ought to refer this bill to the Committee on Finance and let them call in the experts who served them on the various schedules of the tariff bill and gather the information, so that we may know to what extent the bill will reach.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it is easy enough to make an argument when you assume your premises, for then you may safely take extreme positions. The Senator from Georgia assumed the existence of facts, and upon his assumption proceeded to discuss the merits of this bill. I do not wish to discuss the merits of the bill at this time. The only question before us to-day is the question of reference. I am willing at any time to discuss the bill in all its phases and go fully into its merits, but——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STONE. Certainly; but I was about to remark that I do not think this quite the opportune time to discuss the bill itself. The question now is, To what committee shall the bill be referred?

Mr. GALLINGER. This simply involves the question of reference?

Mr. STONE. Yes; the question of reference only. The merits of the measure will come up for consideration later.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask the Senator one further question? There have been several bills relating to convict labor. This one simply deals with the importation of goods made by convict-labor abroad?

Mr. STONE. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the raw material from which goods are made?

Mr. STONE. Yes; and the raw material from which goods are made. I am not wise enough, however, to draw a line separating raw materials made by convicts and completed fabrics made by convicts. I can see no good reason for admitting one and excluding the other. Both are convict-made, and are therefore in the same class and should be treated alike.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. WEST. Where does the Senator draw the line as to pauper labor? I understand pauper labor is included in the bill. Where would the Senator draw the line on that? What is pauper labor in Europe and what is not pauper labor?

Mr. STONE. As used in this bill pauper labor means pauper labor restrained. The labor that is referred to is of course——

Mr. WEST. The bill mentions "confined labor" before it does "pauper labor."

Mr. LODGE. It is perfectly clear in the bill what it means.

Mr. STONE. It is perfectly clear; and if the Senator would only read the bill, he would not divert me into a useless discussion.

Mr. President, the question involved here I say is one of reference. To what committee shall it go? That is the question. But I might say in passing that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is opposed to this bill, because it would prevent the importation of a little cotton bagging made by convicts in England and Scotland. That is the real nut of the thing with him; that is the basis of his opposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is one of the bases; that is one of the nuts.

Mr. STONE. That is the principal nut.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That attracted my attention to it.

Mr. STONE. Yes; that is exactly what attracted the Senator's attention to it, and the Senator's attention would not in all probability have been attracted to it except for cotton bagging.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not sure about that.

Mr. STONE. Well, I have a pretty definite opinion as to that.

Mr. President, the Senator says that the bill would affect the importation of dyes, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] amended that remark by adding that it would affect every schedule in that tariff law. I think these are gratuitous statements not warranted by the facts. For example, the Senator from Georgia stated when this matter was up before, as he states now, that the bill would affect the importation of dyes, because, he said, that sulphur was an ingredient in the manufacture of dyes, and that German manufacturers of dyes, from whom we get the bulk of dye imports, obtained their sulphur from Sicily, where the sulphur mines are worked by convicts. I suppose the Senator is under that impression now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. STONE. The Senator says "yes." I took occasion, Mr. President, after I had heard from the Senator several weeks ago on this subject, to make some inquiry about the sulphur mines of Sicily. I addressed a letter of inquiry to the Italian Embassy at Washington. The embassy answered that while quite certain that no convicts are worked in the mines of Sicily, yet, to be absolutely sure, I was advised that it would be better to make some further inquiry. Thereupon I addressed a letter to the Italian consul general at New York, whose answer I have here and will read. Under date of April 28, 1914, the Italian consul general at New York wrote me as follows:

SIR: In answer to your favor of the 27th instant, I have the honor to state, from my personal knowledge, that no convict labor is employed in the sulphur mines of Sicily. I have also consulted with natives of Sicily and others who are familiar with labor conditions in that island, and they have uniformly confirmed your and my understanding as to this matter.

With the assurance of my highest respect—

And so forth.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Who is that from?

Mr. STONE. That is from the consul general of Italy stationed at New York.

So, you see, Mr. President, that my friend from Georgia is mistaken about the labor employed in Sicilian sulphur mines. The testimony of the Italian consul general on this subject should have greater weight than a vague impression of the distinguished Senator from Georgia. Let a man assume his facts and he can argue with ease.

Mr. President, the question here is not a revenue question; it is an industrial question. Revenue is not involved in it except incidentally. The main question before us is one relating to manufactures and labor. The revenue feature of it, so far as there is one, is somewhat remote and purely incidental. If this were a revenue bill—if the object of the measure was to increase or diminish the revenues—I concede that in the ordinary practice of the Senate it would go to the Committee on Finance, but there is no rule that gives the Committee on Finance jurisdiction even of revenue bills. Distinctly revenue bills go to the Finance Committee as a matter of orderly procedure and practice, and not because of any fixed rule. It is a matter entirely within the province of the Senate itself to determine the reference to be given a bill of this character. Generally speaking, that is true of all bills, with the possible exception of appropriation bills.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STONE. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the Senator began his statement, and perhaps he may have made a statement upon the matter I am going to inquire about.

I find on the calendar Senate bill 257, which bears exactly the same title as the House bill to which the Senator is directing his remarks. Is that identically the same bill?

Mr. STONE. Yes; it is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand that bill has gone to the Committee on Manufactures and has been reported from that committee.

Mr. STONE. That is true of the Senate bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The House bill which has been referred to the Committee on Manufactures is in identical terms with the Senate bill?

Mr. STONE. I will state to the Senator that I introduced the bill in the first instance in the Senate, and it was referred to the Committee on Manufactures. While it was pending before that committee, and a few days after it was introduced here, an exact duplicate of the bill was introduced in the House and referred to some committee of that body. I can not certainly state at this moment just what committee it was referred to in the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Ways and Means?

Mr. STONE. No; I think it was the Committee on Labor. I am sure it was not the Committee on Ways and Means. I will state, further, to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] that the Senate bill was taken up and considered by the Senate Committee on Manufactures and reported to the Senate, and is now on the calendar.

As the Senator knows, I have been away from the Senate almost constantly for several months, and largely because of that fact the Senate bill, which has been reached more than once on the calendar, has been passed informally and without prejudice. In the meantime the House bill was considered and passed by the House with two or three slight amendments, but none of the amendments affected the bill in any substantial way. When the House bill came over here and was laid before the Senate I happened to be present, and I asked that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, as the Senate bill had been.

Some Senator objected, and thereupon I moved to have it referred to the Committee on Manufactures. A yea-and-nay vote was taken on that motion, and the Senate itself, by a decisive vote, referred the bill to the Committee on Manufactures. The following day I left the city and was absent about three weeks. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] during my absence entered the pending motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption to preserve the history of this legislation correctly, the House bill was never referred to the Committee on Ways and Means at all. As the Senator from Missouri has suggested, it went by reference to the Committee on Labor, and was reported from that committee to the House, as I find on examining the RECORD.

Mr. STONE. I am obliged to the Senator. I stated that I was sure it did not go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It did not.

Mr. STONE. I thought it went to the Committee on Labor. The Senator from Wisconsin, having examined the RECORD, corroborates my recollection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I understand the situation, then, while there may be some verbal differences in the two bills, the essential provisions are the same?

Mr. STONE. Absolutely so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And the Committee on Manufactures has given full consideration to those provisions?

Mr. STONE. Yes; to the Senate bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator that while I would have had some doubt originally as to whether this bill should not go to the Committee on Finance, it seems to me, the Committee on Manufactures having had the Senate bill, and having given the subject full consideration, and the House bill having been also referred to it, that there ought to be no reason now why it should be taken away from that committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was referred by a vote of the Senate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, in examining the two bills—the House bill and the bill that the Senator's colleague reported, which is now on the calendar—I find that there are some verbal changes, but I do not find anything that is consequential.

As an illustration, in the House bill the words "knowingly and fraudulently" are found in section 4. In the bill reported by the Senator's colleague the words "and fraudulently" are omitted. There is likewise in the House bill a proviso to section 8 giving the Secretary of the Treasury authority to destroy goods that were made by persons affected with disease or diseases, and so forth, and that is omitted in the bill reported by the Senator's colleague; but I find no difference that is very important.

I wish to say for myself that while I am of opinion that this bill might well, and perhaps properly should have been, referred to the Committee on Finance originally, in view of the legislative history of the bill I can see no reason for changing the reference now.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I think the particular differences in phraseology referred to by my friend from New Hampshire are amendments offered to the House bill and agreed to in the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be so.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is absolutely right when he says that no changes were made that affect the bill substantially or change it in any material way.

Now, Mr. President, I hurry along in what I have to say about this matter.

I have said that this is not a revenue bill. It is not a tariff bill. It is not its purpose to increase or diminish revenues, although imports may be in some minor degree incidentally affected. The mere fact that the revenue from imports may be in some degree incidentally and collaterally affected does not give the Committee on Finance jurisdiction when the chief, main object and purpose of the bill, plainly set forth, relate to wholly different questions. I contend that the main purpose of a bill and the chief object sought to be accomplished by it should indicate the committee reference and not some merely incidental effect of it. The main purpose of this bill is confessedly and manifestly to save American manufacturers and workmen from competing with foreign establishments employing foreign convict labor. Its chief effect, if enacted into law, would be to prevent that, and would thus accord with the general American policy with respect to free labor competing with convict labor. The sentiment of the whole country is righteously against that kind of competition even as to American convicts, and all the States are striving to rid themselves of it, or at least to minimize the evil as far as possible.

Mr. President, either the Committee on Manufactures or the Committee on Education and Labor has a better right to this bill than the Committee on Finance, because those committees deal with and have primary jurisdiction of the principal questions involved in the measure; and in the House of Representatives, as I have shown, the same bill was referred to the Committee on Labor and not to the Committee on Ways and Means, which has jurisdiction of revenue bills. In the Senate the original Senate bill was referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and this House bill has been given a like reference by a yea-and-nay vote of the Senate. The action taken by both Houses confirms my contention.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. STONE. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then has there been any thorough investigation to see how far-reaching this bill will be, either in the House or anywhere else?

Mr. STONE. I was not before the committee of the House. I do not know what investigations that committee made. Presumptively it was duly considered. I do know the bill was quite extensively discussed in the House of Representatives. The better part of two days was devoted to its discussion in the House, and it was passed, as I remember, without a dissenting vote. I do not think the Senate Finance Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, has any divine right to grab a bill or that it can be trusted beyond other committees to examine into a bill and make an intelligent and honest report upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will pardon me, however, has it not done more work on tariff schedules, and has it not within its reach the facilities to make an investigation to determine just what class of goods would be excluded as perhaps no other committee of the Senate has?

Mr. STONE. Oh, Mr. President, of course it has done more work on tariff schedules than any other committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And also examined into the effect on the revenue? Might not this bill possibly exclude one-half of the things that are now imported?

Mr. STONE. "Possibly might," the Senator says. I say that that is not a possibility, much less a probability.

Of course, the Finance Committee has had more to do with tariff legislation than any other committee. It is its business to consider bills fixing the rates of tariff duties. It has undoubtedly considered questions relating to taxation on imports more than any other committee. I assume, however, that any committee to which this bill may be referred will have the same means of acquiring information upon any phase of it into which the committee may care to inquire that the Committee on Finance could have. It would have the same power to investigate, and the same processes at its command, as the Finance Committee; and I will not assume that the Finance Committee is better qualified, morally or intellectually, to pass upon the merits or effect of the bill.

The incidental question of revenue is not the only question involved in this measure, Mr. President; it is not even the principal question involved, for that question is involved only in a very secondary degree.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, were any hearings held by the Committee on Manufactures before they favorably reported the bill which is identical with the House bill? If so, are those hearings in print anywhere?

Mr. STONE. I do not think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Were any public hearings held there?

Mr. STONE. I do not think there were any public hearings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Were there any hearings of any sort?

Mr. STONE. I can not say. I do not know. I was sick in bed at the time the matter was under consideration. I only know that the committee duly considered and reported the bill. My friend from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] suggests to me that if this were a revenue bill it could not have originated in the Senate: that it would have had to originate in the House. But as a matter of fact the first bill on the subject was introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Manufactures and reported without objection. Nobody ever objected to the Senate having jurisdiction of it. There was no ground for an objection, for it is not in any technical or essential sense a revenue measure.

Mr. President, the chief question in this bill is, Shall materials manipulated and goods made by foreign convict and like kinds of labor—that is, restrained labor—be excluded from our ports? Shall foreign convict-made goods be shut out of our markets? That is the only substantial question here involved.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is this bill limited to convict-made goods? Does it not go away beyond that?

Mr. STONE. Well, it says "pauper labor," too; and——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does it not go away beyond goods made by convict labor and include the remotest relationship to any of the raw material? If 1 per cent or the smallest part of the raw material is produced by convicts, are not the goods excluded?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the bill contains no limitation in that direction. It is very broad—intentionally so. But the Senator's question goes to the merits of the proposition, and I prefer to wait until the bill is before the Senate on its passage before discussing every question affecting its merits. I will not now go into that.

I hold that the Finance Committee has no better right to jurisdiction over this bill than the Committee on Manufactures, nor any greater facilities for investigation, if for any good reason hearings are desirable. The revenue feature of the bill, whatever that may amount to, can only be appealed to by the opponents of the bill as an argument against the passage of the bill, and I will address myself to that when the occasion comes.

Mr. President, I think I have said enough. I wish merely to add that as the Senate bill, in all respects similar to this House bill, was referred to the Committee on Manufactures and reported back, and as the House bill has also, by a vote of the Senate, been referred to the same committee, I can see no sound reason why that reference should not stand. Why does any Senator wish to change the reference? Is it to delay the consideration of the bill, and kill it by procrastination?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator wish an answer?

Mr. STONE. Yes; I really do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to have it delayed until there can be a full investigation.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator from Georgia a question? Has he any reason on earth to assume that the Committee on Manufactures will not give this bill proper investigation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have the greatest respect for the Committee on Manufactures, and especially for its chairman. I served on it until last March. But I do not believe that the committee has the facilities or the agencies at hand to make the investigation that the Committee on Finance has.

Mr. REED. What agency is there that the Committee on Finance has that the Committee on Manufactures can not call before it in five minutes of time, except, perhaps, the power of summoning the superior wisdom of the members of the Committee on Finance?

Mr. STONE. You could hear those members, too.

Mr. REED. We could hear them and be enlightened.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You did not do it.

Mr. REED. We did not do it because there were no applications on their part. One would hardly have the temerity to seek the wisdom of those men unless it was tendered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I meant is, when you considered the bill before you did not have any hearings at all, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. REED. You are not correctly informed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are not printed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to answer the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. The Finance Committee was divided into subcommittees—at least, the Democrats were—and they worked over the schedules of the tariff bill. I think the Republican members divided and worked over it, too. There was a long list of experts who were called in for conference on the schedules. I was one of a subcommittee which had before it on the schedules we had under consideration experts, and I know there were experts selected upon the different schedules. I know the information obtained from the experts who helped prepare the tariff bill did give the members of the Finance Committee a facility for investigation, not that they were men of greater ability who were on the committee to do this work. I think they could go on with this bill and get the information much more readily. I do not for a moment suggest that the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures is not at least the equal mentally of any man on the Finance Committee and is not just as capable of doing the work that is assigned to him as any Senator here; and he knows my very high personal regard and esteem and friendship for him.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia refers to the fact that the majority members of the Finance Committee were divided into several subcommittees, and that different schedules were assigned to those subcommittees. I suppose the Senator would now like to have those subcommittees reassembled to take up this bill, and to have the bill chopped into several parts, and the parts conveyed to the subcommittees, respectively. That would mean that the bill would not be seen again under the mellow skylights of this Chamber. The Senator from Georgia could then rest in peace. Clearly this whole movement for a change of reference is to dispose of this bill by some slow process of committee strangulation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STONE. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to say to the Senator that I should like to have it delayed until I may know just what it is going to reach. The moving thought of the bill appeals to me, but I want to know that it does not exclude things from coming in here that ought to come in. It is so far-reaching in its scope that I confess I do not know what it will exclude, and I should like to have an investigation long enough and thorough enough to find out.

Mr. STONE. The Senator has had several months since the Senate bill was reported to make investigations. Although he has been very busy, the Senator has not been so busy that he might not have discovered that the sulphur mines of Sicily were not worked by convicts, and thus have saved himself from being imposed upon by some interested sharper. He has had plenty of time to make inquiries from responsible and trustworthy sources concerning the matters that appear to trouble him. He has neglected his opportunities.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said I wanted to investigate it.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator wants to investigate, he might get some of the so-called experts he refers to and make inquiries of them. I think the Senator can find out all he cares to know or needs to know if only he is diligent.

Mr. President, the Senator says he wants to know who is going to be hurt or what is going to be hurt by this measure. There is the rub. There are some Senators here from cotton States who seem to fear that they may lose something if they are shut off from a little cotton bagging made by foreign convict labor. There is the rub. Heaven knows I have only the kindliest feeling for the cotton raisers of the South. Their work is one of tremendous importance to the Nation, both as to our exports and our industries. Besides, these people are close to my heart. We have cotton raisers in Missouri. In several of our southeastern counties a large number of our farmers are extensively engaged in the production of cotton, and a very high grade of cotton, too. I certainly would do anything I could honorably do for the well-being of this worthy constituency; and I would do the same thing for the cotton producers of Mississippi and Georgia. But I think the cotton raisers and buyers, while asking for themselves, should remember to be just to other people and other interests.

Mr. President, after all, the cotton raisers have been pretty well treated by this Congress. We have made numerous large appropriations and enacted several statutes for their special benefit. They have been given free cotton bagging from all the world. It may come free even from India, where the labor wage is only a few cents per day. It may come free from any country on the globe. By our new tariff law we gave this freedom to these importations for the special benefit of the cotton States, and this notwithstanding other Americans had millions invested in cotton-bagging manufacturing plants, in which thousands of high-wage American workingmen are employed. Now, do you really wish to go farther than we have gone, and do you really want to put our manufacturers and laborers into a hard and sharp competition with the foreign convict labor of the world? We do not now do that in Missouri, even with respect to our own convicts. You do not do it in Georgia. You do not do it in Mississippi. All the States have been legislating against that sort of thing.

It is a difficult problem, I know, but the people of our several States are trying to solve it, so that free labor may as far as possible escape competition with convict labor. But now, while we are closing our own penitentiary doors against this character of competition, would you open wide our national gateways to the free entrance of fabrics wrought by the hands of foreign convicts? Have we a more tender regard for foreign convicts than for our own? It is hard for me to believe that the cotton planters of the South are willing to stand in that light before the country.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, most regretfully I am constrained to believe that if this cotton-bagging proposition were not present my friends from Georgia and Mississippi would not be sweating blood nor sweating anything else over this bill. They would be taking it easy, and their course would be at least marked by a high degree of indifference.

Mr. President, let me assure my friends that their constituents have little or nothing to fear from this bill if it becomes a law. The amount of cotton bagging that would be excluded would be negligible as compared with the total importations. Let me show you why this is true There are in America 33 manufacturers engaged in making bagging, including piece and rerolled bagging. There are also 10 American manufacturers engaged in working over second-hand bagging; 43 in all. Two of these are located in my State, and they have a large amount of capital invested and employ a large number of men.

Mr. President, I voted for the new tariff law, but I am not willing that American manufacturers and workingmen shall be put into open competition with the imprisoned labor of the outside world, especially when in all of our States we are devising ways and means to avoid this character of competition at home.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What do the convicts make in your State?

Mr. STONE. As I understand, most of them are now working upon things produced for the use of the State. Until recently convicts in Missouri were hired to contractors engaged inside the prison in making shoes, harness, overalls, and a few other things for sale in the general market; but the legislature recently passed a law putting a stop to labor contracts of that kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What articles are manufactured?

Mr. STONE. I presume whatever the State needs in its various institutions. It is a serious problem in our State, where we have twenty-odd hundred convicts, as it is a serious problem in other States, to find employment for these prisoners without having them working in competition with free labor; but my State has decided upon that policy, and we are working out the problem as best we can, just as other States are working it out.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is not necessary to find employment for the convicts of Europe when we have our own to take care of.

Mr. STONE. No; the Senator is right; and if we shut out the home products of convict labor, why should we furnish a market for the products of foreign convicts?

I have spoken of the 43 American concerns engaged in the manufacture of cotton bagging. Now, as to foreign concerns—and to this I invite the special attention of the Senators from Georgia and Mississippi out of a hope that I may in some measure allay their fears—there are 61 foreign concerns engaged in manufacturing cotton bagging. Of the entire number in this country and in all other countries, being 106 all told, only 2 in the whole world use prison-manipulated materials or employ prison labor in their business. One of these is Cleghorn & Co. (Ltd.), of Dundee, Scotland, and the other is The Bootle Jute Co. (Ltd.), of Bootle, England.

Cotton bagging is on the free list, and American users of cotton bagging could continue to buy freely from any of the 104 American and foreign manufacturers who employ only free labor. There are only two concerns, one in Scotland and one in England, who employ convicts in their business, and the products of these two only would be reached and barred by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the final manufacture; but what about the production of the raw material?

Mr. STONE. They are the only two in all the world, as I am most credibly informed, who use material made by convicts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. STONE. The Senator says no. Does he affirm the fact to be otherwise?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know, but I have just been told that there are more. If I were sure that you are right, I would not be worrying about it. I am afraid you are mistaken.

Mr. STONE. I think I am right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know you think it is so.

Mr. STONE. I do think it is so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am afraid you are mistaken.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if my information is correct, then it shows that my friends have conjured a bugaboo and are needlessly afraid. But even if the amount of cotton bagging involved was many fold greater than I think, I would still stand for the just principle of this bill and urge its enactment. Cotton bagging is not the only commodity involved in this bill. It is only one of many. I have spoken at length especially of cotton bagging, because that is the one item which invokes the stubborn opposition of my friends from Georgia and Mississippi. But, as I have said, there are many articles manufactured by convict labor in foreign countries and sent forth into the markets of the world. I could name numerous articles thus manufactured, but I do not regard it as of sufficient importance at this time to occupy the attention of the Senate for that purpose. I can do that hereafter when the bill is up for consideration on its merits. At this time I will refer to but one article of foreign manufacture in which convict labor is employed. I am told that in the prisons of Austria many people are employed in making buttons, particularly shell buttons, for sale in the general market of the world. It so happens that along the upper Mississippi River, in Missouri and Iowa, a great many people are engaged in making shell buttons, and they receive wages conforming to the American standard. In the interest of American manufacturers and consumers we materially reduced the tariff duty on all kinds of buttons imported from abroad. I voted for that bill, but I am not willing to subject our people who are engaged in this industry to a competition with the products of Austrian prisons. The cases I have cited are sufficient for the present. In the interest of justice and fair dealing, I am bound to take a firm stand for the principle of this bill, and I do not intend to be driven from it by any sophistry or any vague apprehension that it might interfere with imports and impair the revenue. I want to interfere to the fullest extent necessary to make the importation of foreign convict-made goods impossible. If anyone desires by any means to take care of foreign convicts and encourage their employment at the expense of American workmen, he and I can not travel together. I will not force our people into a destructive and almost immoral competition of that character.

Mr. President, unless some Senator desires to say something further, I shall move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WEST. I desired to ask the Senator a question before he took his seat.

Mr. STONE. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. WEST. I notice in the discussion of the senior Senator from Missouri that he never one time referred to pauper labor. If pauper labor is not mentioned in this bill, then convict labor is not mentioned.

Mr. STONE. What is the point the Senator has in mind?

Mr. WEST. I have this point: If we exclude the product of the pauper labor of all Europe from entry into American ports, it would cut down half of the tariff law. That is what I have in mind.

Mr. STONE. Upon what state of facts does the Senator base that observation?

Mr. WEST. I ought not to endeavor to elucidate this fact to the distinguished Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I deny that is a fact.

Mr. WEST. It has been discussed here in this Chamber time and again when the tariff was up, and when they endeavored to get a tariff on the manufactured products of the country they would say you have to meet the pauper-labor conditions of the world.

Mr. STONE. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. WEST. But that word, I say, is not here. It is used disjunctively. You say convict labor, pauper labor, and restrained labor——

Mr. GALLINGER. But the term "pauper" is defined in a later section of the bill.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will read the bill, as I have suggested to him, he will find an answer to his question. He should read the bill before discussing it.

Mr. WEST. It is in the caption.

Mr. STONE. But the caption is not the bill.

Mr. WEST. It is in the bill.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator would read the text of the bill it would save him time and trouble.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. STONE. I will not, for the moment, make a motion to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Maryland, until the Senator from Mississippi has been heard.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the merits of the bill which the Senator has introduced or of House bill 14330, which is identical with it, any more than I can not avoid it. That there is something more behind the end sought in this legislation than merely to exclude products of convict labor will become very evident to the mind of any Senator who will read the bill and the present tariff law. From page 92 of the tariff law, paragraph 1, I read as follows:

That all goods, wares, articles, and merchandise manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labor shall not be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is hereby prohibited, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to prescribe such regulations as may be necessary for the enforcement of this provision.

Paragraph 408 of the tariff law puts on the free list—

408. Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and similar fabrics, suitable for covering cotton, composed of single yarns made of jute, jute butts, sesg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or other material—

And so forth.

That being the cotton bagging free-list provision of the tariff law. Senators will notice that aloe, mill waste, Russian seg, and so forth, are included. As a matter of fact, the Russian seg is all produced by convict labor, and the mill waste which goes into the cotton bagging made in Scotland is all produced by convict labor, though the cotton bagging itself is not so produced.

The bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri, as you might expect in the case of a bill introduced by him, covers every point which he seeks to cover. He and I are such good friends that we could not afford to deal with one another in any other way than frankly. He has stated that the reason why we were objecting to this bill was largely because we thought it would prohibit the introduction of cotton bagging. He is telling the truth. I doubt if my attention would have been called to the bill at all but for the fact that it affected largely the interests of my own constituents.

Senators have a great deal to do, and except when things affect some cardinal, vital, moral, fundamental, or constitutional principle, or else some interest of their constituents, they are apt to let things go through. That, by the way, accounts for the fact that this bill was originally permitted to be referred to the Committee on Manufactures. It was simply because nobody noticed it; we heard only the title, and did not understand what the bill was aiming to do, and so made no objection. When the bill was rereferred upon a vote of the Senate, it was, as Senators will remember, because debate was cut off. I was upon my feet, and was taken off my feet without an opportunity to debate upon the subject.

Mr. President, as I said, I do not want to discuss the merits of the bill; but this bill, whose sole object is said to be to prohibit the entry of convict-made goods, has 11 sections to it, and it would be well for Senators to study the 11 sections when they come to consider the bill upon its merits. By the way, it would be well to study the first paragraph of section 3 especially, in which these goods are "liable to be proceeded against, probable cause having been shown, in any district court of the United States within the district where the same is found and seized, for confiscation by a process of libel for condemnation," thus giving the Bagging Trust of this country a new process—that is, new to the tariff laws—of stepping in and embarrassing and bedeviling the importers of cotton bagging by an admiralty process until they have discouraged them from further importation, and the manufacturers shall thereby have secured to themselves the sale of their cotton bagging to the cotton producers of the South; and amongst the members of that great Cotton Bagging Trust are the two great cotton-bagging manufacturing plants in the city of St. Louis, Mo., who have been disgruntled and dissatisfied ever since bagging was put on the free list.

The Senator from Missouri says we ought not to object, because we have put cotton bagging upon the free list. We are objecting because we think this bill very effectually is going to take it off the free list. I always try to place my objection to a measure upon not only the legal and constitutional grounds, if there be any, and the grounds of public policy which present themselves, but if there be any reasons back of it of an economic character affecting my own constituents, I like frankly to state them. My constituents are interested in the cheapest possible cotton bagging; but the Senator from Missouri says that, although that may be true, that that does not or ought not to overcome the great principle of not bringing honest labor into competition with convict labor. The Senator could not tell me what articles are manufactured by the convicts of Missouri. I do not know; but I will bet my hat against a chinquapin that they do manufacture things that honest labor manufactures in this country——

Mr. STONE. But exclusively for State use.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that those things are sold in competition with honest labor. The Senator now tells me that they only manufacture such things as are sold to the State, and I suppose he means the counties and to the other public bodies in the State: I mean the political municipalities. Even if that be true, if the convicts did not manufacture those things and sell them to the State, honest labor somewhere would manufacture them and sell them to the State. In the State of Indiana, the State of the President of the Senate—I happen to think of that because I happen to see him at the moment—the convicts manufacture binding twine. The Senator says that we want to run the risk of the competition of the labor of foreign convicts when we forbid it at home; but we do not; and, what is more, we could not. It is impossible to stop the competition unless you are going to confine the convicts within four walls and keep them in isolation and in idleness at the public expense, to do no work and to run crazy. In the State of Indiana they manufacture binding twine by convict labor, and it is, of course, sold in competition with the honest labor which otherwise would manufacture binding twine. In the State of Mississippi we raise cotton with convict labor on farms owned by the State, and, of course, that cotton comes in competition with the cotton which I raise and which all other cotton producers raise, and in the production of which honest labor is employed.

This is a right grave question, Mr. President; it goes to a greater question even than the one alleged to be aimed at by the Senator from Missouri, and the thing really aimed at so exhaustively in all the sections of this bill. What are you going to do with your convicts?

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment, please, sir. Here is a bill to prevent the importation of articles produced by convict labor or, to use the language of the bill—and I beg to call attention to it——

Mr. STONE. I should like, if the Senator will permit me, to call his attention to the fact that he is asking what are we going to do with the convicts. I presume he means the convicts imprisoned in the States of this Union. That question is not involved here, although I think some answer could be made—not satisfactory to him, but a pretty good answer could be made to his inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it is a good answer, it would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. STONE. But the point here is whether the Senator is willing to allow foreign convict labor to come in competition with the labor of the United States. Are you seeking to give employment to them? Are you interested in what they are going to do with their convicts abroad?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not seeking to give employment to any convicts anywhere, here or abroad, but this other bill to which I shall refer is a part of a common joint enterprise. Another bill, which is upon the calendar here, is to forbid the interstate shipment of goods made by convict labor. Now, in my State, for example——

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. We at first kept the convicts within prison walls. I remember in the old times Tennessee did that, and the convicts made furniture, they made chairs, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator will yield——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not argue consecutively unless I am allowed to discuss one thing at a time. I am quite willing to be heckled, but I should like to finish my statement.

Mr. HUGHES. I have no desire to heckle the Senator, but he has said on three different occasions, separated by wide intervals of time, that there is a bill on the calendar to prevent the interstate shipment of goods made by convict labor. I never heard of such a bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I may be mistaken about its being upon the calendar; but my memory is that it passed the House and came here.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is mistaken about that. That bill does not seek to do anything of the kind, and I wanted the Senator to get the matter straight.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know there is a bill seeking to accomplish that purpose. Whether it is on the calendar I am not certain, though I had the idea that it was.

Mr. HUGHES. The bill came over from the House, as the Senator has said, and has been referred to a committee, but it does not seek to do anything of the kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill that I read did. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, to go ahead with some degree of sequence, if I can, this bill not only goes to the extent that the prohibition in the tariff law goes, but it says—mark the language:

Or in the production of which convict, pauper, or prison labor has been employed—

By the way, what in the world does "pauper labor" mean? Who is going to define it?—

either directly or indirectly, in any manner and for any purpose, or in the production or manufacture of which has been used any material prepared, manipulated, or assembled by convict, pauper, or prison labor.

All of the jute in India, out of which cotton bagging is made, is undoubtedly manipulated and undoubtedly assembled by the poorest paid labor in the world. So that if there be any pauper labor anywhere in the world outside of the poorhouse it is found there in that industry. If there be any pauper labor outside of the poorhouses, it would apply to India.

I see that in section 9 the Senator has done what I supposed he would have done if that were his purpose, because he has provided that the word "pauper," as used in the act, is to be "limited to those persons who are held or confined in eleemosynary institutions at the public expense in whole or in part." In part. What does that mean? Anybody who has received outdoor help.

Now, Mr. President, I want to discuss the question of reference. I would not have gone into the merits of the bill at all but for the fact that the Senator from Missouri did so. I was compelled, therefore, to follow him. Senators, when you come to a matter of reference it has become largely the habit of the Senate to permit the Senator who introduces a bill to select the committee which he thinks will favorably report his bill, and refer it to that committee; and, as a rule, by a sort of common so-called courtesy, but really neglect of duty from carelessness, we let it go at that; but I submit that that is not the sound rule by which to be guided in matters of reference.

The Senator says that this is not a matter affecting the revenue of the country; the Senator says, in proof of that, that the Senate Committee on Manufactures, before the House bill came over, reported a bill identical with this bill, which got upon the calendar, and that if it had been a matter affecting the revenues of the country it could not have originated in the Senate. I suppose many a time a committee of this House has, in ignorance or in carelessness, reported some bill affecting the revenue. The proper time to make the point and the first opportunity to make it is when the bill comes up for consideration. This bill does affect the revenue; and if the Senate bill had come up for consideration I had purposed to make—and if it instead of the House bill shall come up for consideration I shall hereafter make—the point of order that it does affect the revenue and, therefore, that it can not originate in the Senate of the United States.

Senators, to say that a bill which puts certain classes of goods upon the free list or which would subject them to a duty any more affects the revenues of the country than a bill which forbids their importation seems to me to be a statement capable of no possible basis of support. If it affects the revenue to place a duty, if it affects the revenue to remove all duty, then it equally affects the revenue to forbid the importation of the article. For that very reason the clause which I read you a moment ago forbidding the entry into the ports of the United States of convict-made goods was part of a tariff act, and it came before the Senate properly from the Finance Committee. The fact that a bill here was carelessly referred to the wrong committee is not a reason why it should remain in the wrong committee.

The Senator himself admits that the bill affects the revenue, because he admits it would cut off the importation of some of the cotton bagging. That is as far as his admission went. I think he would find upon a thorough examination of the case that that is a mistake. So far as I can learn, there was no thorough examination, there were no hearings of experts or of anybody else before the Committee on Manufactures. I think he would find upon hearings that the bill goes further than he admits; but whether it does or not, if it went no further than his admission, it does affect the revenue. The minute the Senator admits that it does affect the revenue at all, ever so little, this body has no constitutional right to originate the measure, and no committee of this body, even after the House has passed it, has any jurisdiction over this subject matter except the Finance Committee. The Senator himself has made the admission in measure, which, however small, is a destruction of his own contention. To some extent when you are arguing the reference of a bill you must consider the purport of the bill itself, because it is the purport of the bill which fixes the jurisdiction of the committees of the Senate.

The Senator says this bill would prohibit the importation of "some cotton bagging." It would prohibit the importation of every bit of cotton bagging made of Russian seg. It would prohibit the importation of every bit of cotton bagging into which one pound of waste enters in the manufacture at Dundee or the other places in Scotland, because the so-called jute waste is all worked up there by convict labor, and I take it there is very little Scottish cotton bagging without more or less so-called waste in it.

The free cotton-bagging provision of the tariff law was aimed at the Cotton Bagging Trust of this country. There has not been a more wicked trust, there has not been a more complete trust, with the lines better drawn, than that one. Nobody has suffered more by the exploitation of the trusts than the consumers of cotton bagging have suffered by the exploitation of that trust. Nobody has benefited more from its operations than these two St. Louis, Mo., concerns. Here is a proposition not only to take cotton bagging off the free list, where we placed it, but to "protect" it more thoroughly than if a duty of 100 per cent were put upon it; and still it is said by the Senator from Missouri that that proposition "does not affect the revenues."

One other thing, Mr. President. The Senator says this bill affects only incidentally the importation, but directly affects manufactures, and therefore ought to go to the Committee on Manufactures. The Committee on Manufactures has no jurisdiction over anything except domestic manufactures. It has, and from the nature of the case can have, no jurisdiction over foreign manufactures. Domestic manufactures are not touched in the bill except for the purpose of "protecting" them, to use the Senator's own language.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I will go back to something that I started once, when interrupted, to enter into. I do not know what Senators propose to do in interstate commerce with the convict labor of this country. It has been suggested down our way that we work convicts upon the public roads, and some people seem to think that if you do that you will not interfere with honest labor. Why, of course you will interfere with honest labor if you work them upon the public roads, because if you did not work the convicts there the roads would either be worked by the county or State and by free labor hired by the county or State, or else the roads would be put out at contract upon specifications and worked by contractors, who in their turn would hire free labor to work on the roads.

We first tried keeping the convicts shut up in prison, and making such things as they could make there. The complaint was made that that interfered with honest labor. Then we carried them out and put them on the cotton farms, a majority of our convicts being colored people, and those who were white being accustomed to cotton and corn raising there, this was a natural and not cruel nor unusual species of labor for them. We put them at the sort of work least cruel, least onerous, in which they were most efficient and to which best accustomed. Now there is proffered in another bill than this a proposition, if opinion can be gotten behind it sufficiently strong to bring it into the arena of Congress for discussion and legislation, to say to us that the cotton raised by these convicts in Mississippi shall not be shipped outside of the State of Mississippi, and that the binding twine which is made in Indiana shall not be shipped outside of that State, although the demand in neither State would be sufficient to consume the product.

If any Senator can suggest anything in the world to do with convict labor that will not compete with some form of honest labor elsewhere, he will suggest something which, if consummated, is devoutly to be wished; but I confess that I have thus far found no way to do it. When we go outside of our own country and take up the question of importation of goods from abroad, if we confess that at home we can not give to convicts any labor of any description which will not somewhere and somehow compete with honest labor in the manufacture or production of something, then we equally confess that no foreign country can do that which we confess we are unable to do; but still you are going abroad, then, indirectly, by laws forbidding importation, to accomplish convict-work reformation abroad which you confess yourselves unable to accomplish at home—on the assumption, of course, that you vote for this measure.

I do not see for the life of me how we can hope, by a little thing like this, to reform the convict-labor systems of Russia and Scotland and British India, yet if the purposes stated by the Senator from Missouri are to be taken as his real purpose, that is his remote object. If we can not reform that system in Mississippi and Indiana and Missouri and Illinois and Dakota, I do not see how we can expect to bring to bear pressure which will reform it abroad. I see only one thing that you are doing by it, and that is to repeal, in small part or in great part or in whole—I do not care which—the provision that puts several things upon the free list, and most obviously of all cotton bagging.

I wish some Senator would suggest to me now some possible avenue for the treatment of convicts short of keeping them in isolation and in idleness—because if you keep them in idleness without isolation or work you are not punishing them—which does not involve the manufacture, the growth, the production, or the construction of something which somehow, somewhere, must interfere with honest labor. It is a problem that every enlightened nation on the surface of the earth has struggled with, and thus far unavailingly.

At one time we hired out our convicts, but the resulting cruelties and abuses were such that the civilized instincts of Mississippians revolted, and the law had to be repealed. Long prior to that we had passed away from the old system of confinement with hard labor. We had taken the position which the enlightened sentiment of the world has taken, that you have a right to punish a man for crime, but you have not a right to murder him or to render him insane; that, after all, he is a human being. By the way, there are a great many men out of the penitentiary who are a great deal worse than a great many men who are in it. We have long since taken the position that the punishment ought to be adequate to the crime, and not too severe. We have long since taken the position that while punishing the criminal we ought to try to some extent to reform him, so that when he gets out of prison he shall not be a worse man, and possibly may be a better one, than when he went in.

The convict has some rights, as little as we think of it—men like us whose mental horizon is never clouded by the thought that they may ever be behind prison bars. His right is to be treated humanely, firmly, so that he shall feel the punishment, but not cruelly; and the right of the State is that while being treated in that way he shall contribute something to his own support, and that honest men who labor with their hands every day and pay direct and indirect taxes shall not pay all the expenses of his continued existence.

If you were to put convicts in prison and keep them there without labor at all, within four walls all the time, and send school-teachers there to teach them and send preachers and priests there to preach to them and confess them and reform them, you would still be weighing down the shoulders of honest labor by the burden of their support. Even then they would be thus indirectly competing with honest labor, because honest labor would be called upon, out of its hard-earned money, to pay for feeding, clothing, educating, amusing, and reforming them. They would be supporting at public expense the convicts of the country, just as they support the Army and the Navy.

To go back to the question of affecting the revenue, by our rules questions affecting the public revenue go to the Finance Committee. By the rules questions affecting manufactures go to the Committee on Manufactures. This question does not affect the domestic manufactures of the United States at all, except indirectly and remotely by relieving them of a certain degree of foreign competition, and thereby "protecting" them. Hitherto, when men have sought to protect domestic industries, they have sought it through a tariff tax, and the Finance Committee has had jurisdiction over the subject matter. If the method of protecting them be to forbid importation, the principle guiding reference is the same.

I hope, Senators, that the Senate will send this matter to the Finance Committee. It may be that I am mistaken as to its effects. It may be that the Senator from Missouri is more nearly right than I think he is. It may be that this bill will affect cotton bagging very slightly, though I think it will affect it very much. It may be, as he asserts, that it will affect nothing else, although I think he is mistaken about that. I hope, however, that the bill will go to the Finance Committee, and that we may be enabled to give it the careful hearing that it deserves, not because the members of that committee are at all superior in mental caliber or in information to the members of the Manufactures Committee, but, in the first place, because they are the committee designated by the rules for this sort of legislation, and, in the second place, because the members of that committee have certainly had more experience in dealing with questions of this sort than the members of another committee.

I see it is pretty nearly time for the unfinished business to come before the Senate, and I do not want to prevent the Senator from Missouri from securing a vote. Therefore, although much more to the point might be said, I shall sit down.

Mr. STONE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. It will continue it as long as it is found reasonably necessary to have a proper hearing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad to hear the Senator's statement. I think probably some people will want to be heard.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 14385.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I should not presume to occupy the attention of the Senate in the discussion of this question if I were not deeply interested in the principle involved, and I can not resist the temptation to avail myself of this opportunity to assure the Senate that I am as strongly in favor of protecting the honor of my country, and the industries of my country, and the peace of my country as I am in favor of protecting the birds of my country.

Mr. President, I think we must all concede that in the civilized world to-day a written contract, with consideration and without fraud, is to be performed if performance is possible, and if there is a difference of opinion as to its scope and meaning and that difference can not be adjusted amicably, resort must be had to an impartial tribunal. Great Britain and the United States have been the leaders among the nations in asserting the sanctity of contractual obligations. And the wisdom of submitting controversies relating thereto to courts of justice rather than to cannon and powder carts has been loudly proclaimed by the sane men of both nations for many years. Civilization is but another term for self-restraint. That old shibboleth, "My country, right or wrong," has cost humanity 50 per cent of its substance and 60 per cent of its self-respect up to date. We may still be compelled to use it in times of war, but in times of peace its use can and should be avoided. International obligations are no less sacred than agreements between citizens. Justice does not have one standard for the big and another for the little things. "A pound is a pound the world around." The same law that causes the apple to fall to the ground keeps the stars in their places. The same rule of right that forbids a trespass against a neighbor forbids a trespass against a stranger.

At a time like this we are inclined to appeal to the patriotic emotions. This is always in order when one's cause is just, and it is necessary in other cases. We always like to hear nice things said about the flag, and we like to hear the eagle scream once in a while in times of peace just to be reassured that he has lost nothing of his war-time courage and appetite. We are all patriots, of course, and we are all firm believers in that kind of patriotism which is founded in the faith that right makes might. The difficulty lies not in our good intentions, but in our discriminating machinery. The ease and comfort with which honest and able men disagree is startling and would be disconcerting but for the fact that a majority of honest men will probably choose the right more frequently than they will choose the wrong. My sympathies and prejudices are all with those who oppose the pending measure, but my sympathies and prejudices do not square with what I conceive to be my duty and the right thing and the wise thing for this country to do.

The matter under discussion involves the interpretation of two written contracts between Great Britain and the United States and nothing more. All questions of policy and politics and profit and loss must be put aside. We must ascertain, if possible, what we promised to do in these contracts, and then do it. That is my view of my duty in the premises. What the Canadian railroads or what our own railroads want or do not want; what will benefit New England or the South, the Pacific coast, or the Central West; what the shipping interests want or do not want; what the effect upon our commerce as a whole will be; what the canal cost or will produce in tolls; what my own feelings and prejudices and the feelings and prejudices of the people of this country may be against the other party to these contracts must all be put aside, for none of them can throw the least light upon the question at issue, as I view it.

The two contracts to which I refer are the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the arbitration treaty with Great Britain, and to the language of these contracts and the testimony of those who wrote them we must go for the best evidence of the obligations which they contain. The preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty declares that the United States and Great Britain—

> Being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries—

And so forth.

Let us now see what the "objections" were in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which we desired to have removed, and what were the "general principles" of neutralization in that treaty which were "not to be impaired" in the treaty now in force. It is conceded that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was a contract very disadvantageous to the United States. Whether it was the best that could be had is unimportant. Great Britain's interest in Central America was much greater than ours in 1850. Her position and proprietorship in Central America compelled us to negotiate with her and her attempt at that time to secure Tigre Island, near the entrance of the canal, greatly inflamed the public mind. War was actually threatened. A peaceful solution of the difficulty was all-important, and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was the result. It is easy to criticize men with grave responsibilities in hand. We may have got the worst of the bargain in 1850, but it was a bargain—a contract fairly considered and solemnly executed.

But when we come to read the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, we find that the United States secured release from article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the important part of which I quote:

> The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America.

It is manifest that a release from this unfortunate copartnership had to be secured, and it is immaterial whether the price we paid was excessive or not.

Let us note now that in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the contract now in force, we agree "that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the 'general principle of neutralization' or the obligation of the high contracting parties."

And again, in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in article 3, we find the following promise:

> The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

By the terms of the Suez Canal treaty all tolls are equal, and this promise has been strictly adhered to.

Now let us turn back to article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and read there the general principles of neutralization which were to be preserved by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which is now in force:

> The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Government shall approve of as just and equitable, and that the same canals or railways being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

There certainly can be no doubt that by the provisions of this article the ships of Great Britain and the United States were to use the canal on equal terms wherever located, but it is claimed, and with reason, that the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty upon this particular point is not as clear in this regard. It is as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war "of all nations" observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was pending an attempt was made to insert an amendment giving the United States the right to exempt her coastwise ships. This amendment was rejected. Some say it was rejected because it was thought to be unnecessary; others deny this and intimate that Great Britain would have rejected the treaty had the amendment been accepted. The witnesses representing the United States, who were in a position to know what was intended by the language which I have just quoted, were Mr. Hay, our Secretary of State, and Mr. Choate, our ambassador at the Court of St. James at the time, and Mr. Henry White. Mr. Choate, who, according to Senator Lodge, was largely responsible for the language used in the treaty, insists that it was understood that the term "all nations" included the United States. Mr. Hay is dead, but Mr. Henry White, then in London as chargé d'affaires, corroborates Mr. Choate. Mr. W. F. Johnson, a journalist and a man of the highest character, reports the following conversation with Mr. Hay in 1904:

I asked Col. Hay plumply if the treaty meant what it appeared to mean on its face, and whether the phrase "vessels of all nations" was intended to include our own shipping or was to be interpreted as meaning "all other nations." The Secretary smiled, half indulgently, half quizzically, as he replied:

"All means all. The treaty was not so long that we could not have made room for the word 'other' if we had understood that it belonged there. 'All nations' means all nations, and the United States is certainly a nation."

"That was the understanding between yourself and Lord Pauncefote when you and he made the treaty?" I pursued.

"It certainly was," he replied. "It was the understanding of both Governments, and I have no doubt that the Senate realized that in ratifying the second treaty without such an amendment it was committing us to the principle of giving all friendly nations equal privileges in the canal with ourselves. That is our golden rule."

Mr. President, this is the testimony of the men, and those who conversed with them, who represented the United States officially at the time. It is the testimony of the only men who were in a position to know what was intended by the language "vessels of all nations," and if we were in an ordinary court of equity we would be compelled to impeach both the intelligence and integrity of every one of our own eyewitnesses to the transaction in order to convince the court of the soundness of the contention that "all" means less than all.

We all know what happens to lawyers who try to impeach their own witnesses. Although President Wilson agrees with Mr. Choate and Mr. Hay, he was not there, and two ex-Presidents disagree with him. It may be that these two ex-Presidents know better than did Messrs. Choate and Hay and White and Lords Lansdowne and Pauncefote what was intended, but is it not true that by all the rules of evidence, simple and complex, that wisdom and experience have written for the guidance of the judges of our domestic courts, they would stand to lose their contention out of the mouths of their own witnesses in chief.

However, let us concede that taking all the surrounding circumstances into consideration, there is room for honest and intelligent difference of opinion as to what the words "all nations" should and do include. We must, then, certainly admit the existence of a difference of opinion as to the interpretation of the language of our treaty with Great Britain, and if anything else were needed to prove the existence of such a difference I will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Great Britain emphatically denies the justice of our contention, and the further fact that all well-regulated Americans in the Senate and out of it have been engaged in a dispute "relating to the interpretation of" this treaty for many months past.

Are we not now forced to come to our second contract with Great Britain—the arbitration treaty—which directs us to the way and the only way in which our difference with Great Britain with regard to the other contract—the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—can be honorably adjusted? We find this way out in the language of that arbitration treaty, which reads as follows:

Differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of the 10th of July, 1899: Provided, nevertheless, That they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States, and do not concern the interests of third parties.

Here we have promised to arbitrate all differences which may arise relating to the interpretation of treaties which differences do not affect our vital interest, our honor, or our independence. If we resort to precedents, we shall find that many differences have been arbitrated which were much more serious than the one here involved. But let us assume that this is the first time, the first dispute that we have ever had with Great Britain, or any other nation, and that we have nothing to resort to but the language of our arbitration treaty which I have just read.

Does the dispute involve anything more than a mere question of dollars and cents, and hardly that, and does it involve anything more than the construction of a contract for the use of a canal? If it were a contract involving the use of a canal intersecting two sovereign States of the Union, and a dispute arose as to the sovereign rights of the parties, that dispute would immediately take its course in court along the way provided by civilized communities, and it would hardly be claimed that the independence or honor or life of the sovereign States were endangered. I commend this comparison to those who insist that this dispute involves our life or independence or honor as a sovereignty. If this difference is one which can not be arbitrated without losing our life, our honor, or our independence as a Nation, then no dispute can arise which is arbitrable, and our peace treaties are a sham and a delusion and a snare for all who have been foolish enough to trust us. I can reach no other conclusion.

If we decline to arbitrate this controversy, we must take the position that saying a question is vital makes it so. In other words, our treaties are interpretable only as they may be interpreted to suit us. If we are to maintain the confidence of the world, we can not take this stand. We must be willing, at least, to follow precedents which Anglo-Saxon civilization has adhered to for centuries. We agreed to compel our ships to pay tolls or we did not. We take the former view; Great Britain takes the latter. Here is the contract upon which we base our contention. Here is our agreement to arbitrate it in the event of a disagreement. To my mind, Mr. President, our honor and our vital interest demand that we respect a plain and simple duty and not repudiate it because we have the power to do so.

This question should be submitted to The Hague. If we lose we lose nothing, and we shall gain much in experience. If we insist upon sitting in judgment in our own cause we are bound to lose our honor, to say the least.

For a long time we have been preaching as a Nation the gospel of international peace and good will. For many years we have insisted at home and abroad that arbitration was the American way of settling all disputes, and we have been insistent and persistent in our appeals to our neighbors to follow our lead. We have persuaded many of the great nations to take us at our word, and it seems to me that the time has come for us to deliver the goods or remove our advertisement.

If we refuse to arbitrate, and refuse to enact the pending legislation, the world will say we are insincere, and our pretty bird of peace, which has flapped its wings in the faces of our neighbors for many years now, will in their eyes resemble a raven more than it will a dove, and it will cast its shadow across the floor of this Chamber for some time if we are not careful.

I want the good work which we have done at Panama to pay in money and morals both. I want it to mark the hour of victory in ethics as well as engineering; not that we shall hesitate to exercise our rights as a sovereign or abate in the least our vigilance in the protection of our material interests. I want this great work, this great gift unapproached in history, to win the good will of the world and to demonstrate our fitness to lead the world in the right direction. I want it to be a triumph for Uncle Sam. I want the other 69 nations of the world to attend this triumph and get acquainted with the man they have cartooned as a swine and skinflint. I want the yellow man, and the brown man, and the red man, and the white man from the four corners of the earth to come and take a look at this gift to them from the man they have suspected and maligned. I want them to see with their own eyes that Uncle Sam is a man of peace and a man of his word, and that when he interferes with the affairs of foreign nations he does it to help them and encourage them along the ways of peace and truth. I do not want this great triumph to degenerate into a trial with Uncle Sam in the dock and his own mother the complainant and chief witness against him. However unjust and harsh she has been in the past and still may be, she will have the sympathy of every other nation in this controversy. If we sit in judgment in our own case, the verdict of the world will be "I told you so." "Uncle Sam plays with loaded dice only."

He will arbitrate when he is sure to win and decline when there is a chance to lose. I believe the American people, when they look at this situation as it is, will not want us to hazard their good name and money both. If the truly great can not afford to be fair, what are we to expect from the weaker nations?

Mr. President, I can easily get my eyes above and beyond the toll-gate in this canal, and I can see profit to my country in doing so. I can raise my eyes above and beyond party platforms, and I am glad the President of the United States has had the courage to tear out one of the unsafe planks in his party platform and put a sound one in its place. I wish he had had the courage to treat some of the other planks in his platform in the same way. I wish he had torn out the plank which committed him to a second-rate banking system. I wish he had removed the plank which prevented a just and equitable tariff revision, and I hope that now he has begun to change his mind he will continue until it has become a habit. It is better to destroy an entire platform than it is to destroy the prosperity of an entire nation.

Political conventions are not composed of prophets or saints. If they are fortunately composed of patriots and make mistakes, those mistakes should be remedied as soon as discovered.

While I do not see how the commercial effect of the payment or nonpayment of tolls by our coastwise ships can enlighten us as to our obligations under our treaties with Great Britain, or throw light upon the intent of those responsible for the language of those treaties, I do find comfort in the conclusions I have reached with regard to this controversy from a purely commercial point of view.

The payment or nonpayment of tolls by our ships has little, if any, economic significance as it seems to me. The sequel of this alleged tragedy of the tolls in dollars and cents will be as bloodless as it would be for me to take a dollar from my right hand and put it in my left hand and then proceed to estimate the profit or loss occasioned by the transfer.

There is no such thing as a free toll. There is no such thing as free transportation. If the Government should buy all the railroads and allow the public to ride at will free of charge, passenger transportation would cost the people of this country much more than it does at present. The people can pay the cost of transporting ships through the canal with money they have contributed to the United States Treasury, or they can pay it when they buy the goods which are carried through the canal and placed upon the market. If the latter course is followed, the added cost on a 4-pound suit of clothes will be one-eighth of a mill, or one-sixteenth of a mill on a 2-pound pair of shoes.

Mr. President, the canal has already cost the State which I represent more than $5,000,000, an average of $25 each for every grown man in Connecticut. I believe that a majority of my constituents will feel that this ought to do for the present, and that those who use the canal should help pay its running expenses. It is true that we have invested many millions in river and harbor improvements, but the Government does not pay for towing ships after it has provided a safe waterway. As a means to secure lower transcontinental rates the payment of tolls by the Government will be utterly ineffective. Railroad rates are fixed by the Government now, and those rates should be high enough to warrant, if possible, safe transportation and the payment of fair wages and dividends.

There are 28,000,000 life insurance policies in this country, and 40 per cent of the money with which these policies must be paid is invested in railroad stocks and bonds. There are 10,000,000 savings bank deposits in this country, and more than 40 per cent of these savings is invested in railroad securities. The capitalization of the railroads of this country is $64,000 per mile, and the average for the other nations of the world is $138,000 per mile. The transportation cost in this country is about half that of the average transportation cost in other countries. There are nearly 2,000,000 railway employees in this country, and the freight handlers and stevedores are the poorest paid class we have.

I think the time has come for us to note the difference between the service which the railroads must render to the Nation and the personal guilt of those who have misused, if not robbed, both the railroads and the public in the past. As an economic factor in the control of our great railroad systems, the payment or nonpayment of tolls by our coastwise shipping is a tempest in a canal, which is somewhat larger than a tempest in a teapot, but of no more consequence. If we can get our eyes above the tollgate in the canal we will see at once that the item of real consequence is the cargo and not the pittance paid for transporting that cargo 40 miles. The item of consequence, I repeat, is the cargo, who produced it, who owns it, where it is to be sold, and at what price. We can endure the transportation of our merchandise in foreign bottoms to be sold at a profit; we can ill afford to transport foreign goods in our own ships to be sold in our own markets for less than the cost of manufacture in our own factories. We have invested $400,000,000 in this canal, a gift to other nations unapproached in history, but we would best be frank and admit that we expect to receive benefits that will more than offset the added facilities for competition which it will furnish to other nations, but no man can tell to-day whether this canal will be a blessing or a burden. If we can get our eyes away from the pennies involved in this dispute we will see an international commerce of $35,000,000,000 or more a year. Of this vast international commerce we get one-tenth, England one-sixth, and Germany one-eighth.

Thirty years ago Germany's foreign trade was $31 per capita and ours was $32. In 1912 Germany's foreign trade was $64 per capita and ours was $37. In other words, our population has increased 85 per cent and our foreign trade 50 per cent per capita during that period, and while Germany's population has increased but 35 per cent, her foreign trade has increased 250 per cent for the same period.

Japan's foreign trade has doubled in 10 years. Ten years ago she exported raw materials; now she imports raw materials and sells her manufactured goods in our markets.

Thirty years ago Germany was sending 250,000 of her sons to this country every year; now she keeps her rising generations at home and keeps them busy making goods to be sold to us in competition with our laborers.

Germany, not as large as Texas, has 30 cities of more than 200,000 people each, and she raises 80 per cent of the food necessary to feed her 64,000,000. She does this by sane and decent treatment of her farmers and manufacturers and their employees. All of her energies are concentrated in helping her industrial growth. She learned some years ago that the strategy of trade is an elastic tariff, always sufficient to give her the best end of the bargain if possible. She knows that trade does not follow the flag or anything else. She knows that trade leads the forces of civilization and that the Nation which can get and keep trade will win the wars of the future of whatever character they may be.

Japan, under the leadership of the keenest men in the Orient, raised her tariff 25 per cent last year. It was done to save Japan from bankruptcy, and it succeeded.

Russia, nearly three times as large as the United States, and just as fertile and rich in natural resources, will in the near future pass both Germany and Japan in foreign trade, as they have already passed Great Britain in their percentages of increase in foreign trade. Brazil and Argentina are also to be reckoned with. The foreign commerce of the world should exceed sixty billions in 1925.

Startling as these figures are, it is worth while to remember that our own domestic trade was more than $65,000,000,000 last year. Our domestic trade to-day is twice that of the international trade of the world, and by 1940 it will exceed one hundred billions if Congress does not prevent.

Russia, Germany, and Japan are to-day adopting every fair means that will strengthen their hold upon their home markets and at the same time extend their opportunities to enter our domestic market, and they hail with delight and expectancy every reduction of our tariff and other unwise and irritating legislation which hampers and hinders legitimate business enterprises.

And free-trade England is not altogether lacking in looking out for her own. I will note an instance in passing. I was informed this morning that a Connecticut company, the Waterbury Button Co., which has for years supplied the United States Government with ornaments for the caps and collars of the men in the Army and Navy, had been notified that the contract for making these goods has been transferred to a British manufacturing concern. The British concern had underbid the Connecticut company, but we must bear in mind that American concerns are not allowed to bid on contracts for similar work in Great Britain, and that the British firm could underbid the American company only because of the cheaper labor in England. Is it a thing to be proud of? The American Government by its own act throws American workmen out of employment and then decorates its own soldiers and sailors with British buttons and military insignia because the Englishmen will make them for wages upon which an American can not subsist. I relate this incident at this time with the hope that it will indicate to the Senators who are so certain that free transportation through the Panama Canal will be of great benefit to American commerce, that the protection of American commerce lies entirely in other directions.

If Congress will regulate and encourage and protect within reason the American manufacturer and employee; if Congress will aid cooperation and harmony and good will, and not destroy all three, the United States will get her share of foreign and domestic commerce. We must make the best goods, and I will grant that we must deliver what we agree to deliver in diplomacy as well as merchandise.

If anyone will take the trouble to read the history of trade expansion he will find that the good will of the purchaser is just as important as good workmanship in manufacture. The main trick in foreign trade, as well as in treaties, is to avoid all tricks and thereby win the friendship and confidence of the stranger. Our merchants know how all-important are good will and friendship in securing trade abroad. The manufacturer may do his utmost, and his agents may be men of tact and skill, and yet he may not be able to market his goods. If our consular agent in a country where trade is sought is incompetent or personally obnoxious by reason of a lack of brains or character, our merchants will be placed at a great disadvantage. Business men know this and many of them know that the Department of State can greatly aid or greatly injure our foreign commerce. In 1910 and 1911 $100,000,000 was added to our export trade through the good offices of the Department of State.

In 1906 President Roosevelt ordered that the civil service should apply to the Consular Service. President Taft issued a similar order. In 1909 and during that year Congress appropriated $100,000 for the reorganization of the Department of State. In a short time order was brought out of the then existing chaos; geographical departments were created; idiotic formulas were abandoned. Indeed, an attempt was made to run the business of the Government upon business principles. What has happened since March 4, 1913? We will say nothing about the ambassadors, their riches or poverty, their contributions to philanthropic or party campaign funds. Their average is no doubt as high as that of their predecessors, but when we come to the ministers, the real workers in the field, the men upon whom our great industrial interests must rely for aid and comfort in foreign lands, what do we find? If my information is correct, when President Wilson took the oath of office there were 32 ministers in the Diplomatic Service, 15 of whom had been promoted from the grade of secretary. A number of others had had diplomatic experience. All but 7 or 8 of these 32 men have already been displaced and not a single appointment made by President Wilson has been made from the service. The good work begun by President Roosevelt and continued by President Taft has already been undone, and our Diplomatic Service has been used to pay the political debts of its chief.

When this record is put before the public in detail, when the employer and employee in this country are made familiar with the names and records of the men who are to look out for their interests in foreign countries, they will realize that this toll-gate is quite invisible as a factor affecting our foreign or domestic trade when Mr. UNDERWOOD's competitive tariff and Mr. Bryan's foreign ministers are put in front of it. I can not dispute the President's political right to return to the spoils system. I do say, however, that the responsibility is his. And I will say that Congress should prohibit by law the surrender of a principle so vital to our industrial welfare.

Mr. President, economic forces conquer all others in time, but in the everyday commerce of the nations confidence has and will play a most important part. It seems to be generally conceded that confidence has left this country for the present. Is it not about time we should acknowledge the cause of its departure? Is it not about time we should admit that it is a clear case of too much Congress? And now is it worth while for Congress to deprive us of the confidence of our neighbors? You can not have confidence abroad if you sidestep your treaty obligations. You can not preserve confidence abroad if your patriotism is of the variety that insists that might makes right. You can not adulterate food and fabrics and win the confidence of those you deceive, and you can not adulterate your international dealings with selfishness, insincerity, or incapacity and win the confidence of the nations of the earth.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in the momentary absence from the Chamber of the Senator in charge of the Panama Canal tolls bill, the unfinished business, I ask that it may be temporarily laid aside and that the Agricultural appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Kenyon	Pittman	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Smith, S. C.
Burleigh	Lodge	Reed	Smoot
Burton	McCumber	Robinson	Sterling

Gore	Norris	Shields	Tillman
Hollis	O'Gorman	Shively	Warren
Hughes	Overman	Smith, Ariz.	West

Mr. PAGE. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] are necessarily absent on the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the Senate proceeds to consider the remainder of the bill I desire to call attention to an error in a portion of the bill that we have passed over, for the purpose of correcting it.

On June 29, 1906, the following law was passed:

Joint resolution directing that the Sulphur Springs Reservation be named and hereafter called the "Platt National Park."

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to change the name of the Sulphur Springs Reservation, an Indian reservation now in the State of Oklahoma, formerly in the Indian Territory, so that said reservation shall be named and hereafter called the "Platt National Park," in honor of Orville Hitchcock Platt, late and for 26 years a Senator from the State of Connecticut and for many years a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in recognition of his distinguished services to the Indians and to the country.

In the bill the provision concerning that park is spelled "Platte," the thought evidently being that it was named after a somewhat famous river. I simply ask that the spelling be corrected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 53, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the letter "e" in the word "Platte."

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume there is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the correction will be made.

Mr. GORE. I am indebted to the Senator from New Hampshire for calling attention to the error.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say that we all recall affectionately the services which the late Senator from Connecticut rendered to the country, and particularly the services he performed on the Committee on Indian Affairs, where so much hard work, and sometimes unappreciated work, is done.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, on yesterday we passed over for the moment the committee amendment commencing at the bottom of page 71 and running on to page 72. In that connection I wish to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment beginning on line 24, page 71, it is proposed to strike out lines 4, 5, 6, and 7 on page 72, and in lieu thereof to insert:

Without reduction of pay: Provided, That the same be taken once in two years: And provided further, That the leave of absence may be extended to three months if taken once only in three years, or four months if taken once only in four years.

Mr. WARREN. That amendment will make the provision conform to the present statute with regard to the employees of the Army and Navy.

Mr. GORE. The amendment, as presented by the Senator, embodies the real purpose which the committee had in view. I ask its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 72, beginning on line 23, the committee proposes the following amendment:

And hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make studies of cooperation among farmers in matters of rural credits and sanitation and of other forms of cooperation in rural communities; to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information growing out of these studies, in order to provide a basis for broader utilization of results secured by the research, experimental, and demonstration work of the Department of Agriculture, agricultural colleges, and State experiment stations; and to employ such persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere as the Secretary may consider necessary, $50,000.

Mr SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice that this amendment provides that "the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make studies of cooperation among farmers in matters of rural credits and sanitation." I understand that the Public Health Service is spending hundreds of thousands of dollars for that very purpose. Special bills have been passed by Congress within a very few years appropriating large sums of money for this very work. There is no legislative appropriation bill or sundry civil appropriation bill but that contains amounts appropriated for this service.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would suggest to the Senator that the annual appropriations for the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service aggregate, I think, over $1,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I am perfectly aware of that. I wish also to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is, I think, a bill on the calendar now giving them greater authority than they have under the present law to go into a State and, in cooperation with the authorities of the State, to study this identical question of sanitation.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I should simply like to ask the Senator from Utah whether, in his judgment, this provision would create commissions to travel in this country investigating sanitation and rural credits or to travel in foreign countries to investigate those subjects?

Mr. SMOOT. Either in foreign countries or in this country. There is no limit upon the appropriation, and not only that——

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator know how the expenses of the commission that visited foreign countries with relation to rural credits were paid?

Mr. SMOOT. They were paid by a direct appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. KENYON. They were paid by the Government?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; they were paid by the Government. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if there was any estimate for this amount?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, there was no estimate for it in the Book of Estimates as originally presented. The department has since submitted this estimate and this proposition on its own motion, and the committee was convinced of the propriety and the wisdom of adopting this amendment.

The Senator is correct in his observation that a great deal of money is expended on public sanitation now. It is a subject of growing interest. I think it deserves a great deal more interest than it has ever received, and the expenditure of a great deal more money than ever has been appropriated for its extension.

This appropriation does not contemplate the establishment of any system of sanitation. It simply directs the study and investigation of the subject. The Senator will realize that in many rural communities the health of the community could be greatly improved, and the dangers to health could be removed with slight expenditure, simply by the dissemination of proper information upon the subject. The investigation doubtless will be conducted on a small scale in different parts of the country, and I doubt not that it will contribute a great deal to the health of many communities whose health is now impaired from obvious causes, but causes that are not always known to the residents of the particular community affected.

So far as rural credits are concerned, it is not intended, as I understand, that this money shall be expended in the investigation of the rural-credit systems in foreign countries. That has already been done by the United States commission which visited Europe last season. There have been some attempts at rural-credit legislation in the United States, particularly in the State of Minnesota; and I think no single subject is engrossing more attention among the farmers of this country to-day than the subject of rural credits. I am sure every Senator here is constantly in receipt of communications from farmers upon the subject. This is preeminently true of the western country, where rates of interest are high.

In my judgment, the pending amendment is the most important single proposition embodied in the pending bill. I do not know, but I assume that to some extent it will follow up the work done by the rural-life commission some years ago. I know that that commission was criticized by some; but, in my opinion, it rendered a vast service to the agricultural interests of the country. The general demand for its report indicates the general interest felt by farmers in the subject.

That rural life in the United States is capable of infinite improvement, I may say, can not be challenged by any Senator. The isolation of farm life and the inherent difficulties of cooperation have barred the progress of farmers and of the agricultural prosperity of the country generally. In its nature, farming forbids the general division of labor which prevails in manufacturing or industrial establishments. The isolation of the farm makes cooperation difficult; and only through increased cooperation and community of interest can the rural life of this country be advanced to the high standard which it is entitled to attain.

I repeat, that I regard this as the most important single proposition in the bill, and fraught with greater and more beneficent consequences to the agricultural interests of the country than any other. I certainly hope it will be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to refer to a duplication of work that is running through all our legislation; and this is only another instance of the kind.

I am heartily in sympathy with the rural-credit legislation that is being considered by the House and the Senate at this particular time; but I call the Senators' attention to the fact that we have had so many public documents printed up to this time that it would be impossible for a farmer anywhere in this country to read them all in a year.

There has not been an article written on rural credits, so far as I know, that some Senator has not asked to have printed as a public document, and it has been done. Not one, not ten, not twenty-five, but I was going to say hundreds of them, have in fact been printed as public documents; and then they have been gathered together and printed again, in a larger form, as public documents. When the last request was made, I balked, and said I thought we should not print any more until the farmers of the country read what we had already printed.

The rural-credit question is already before this body. I do not believe any compositions that may be written in the next year by men who have been sent through this country by the Agricultural Department will contain a particle more information than the articles that already have been published as public documents and are at the disposal of every Senator who desires to send them to any farmer in this country.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. JONES. I wish to suggest that the farmer does not want study, he does not want documents, he does not want articles, but he wants the Senate and the House to take action and pass legislation providing for this.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what he wants. Not only that, but I do not think it is going to do the country any good to have every department of the Government studying exactly the same thing. The question of rural credits is a question of finance, and it seems to me it is a far-fetched proposition for the Department of Agriculture to commence to study that question.

As far as the matter of sanitation is concerned, there is not a State in the Union to-day but that has representatives from the Public Health Service of the Government; and men who are learned in that line of work are working in cooperation with the State authorities, as I stated. There never has been a request made of Congress—and they are increasing every year, as the chairman of the Appropriations Committee knows—without its having been freely granted, because every member of the Appropriations Committee realized the importance of the health of the people of this country. It seems to me strange that we should now be asked to appropriate $50,000 to be divided between sanitation in all parts of this country and rural credits and the work to be directed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

No business man on earth would undertake to duplicate work in his business in any such manner; and I give notice now that if nobody else wants to speak upon this subject I intend to make a point of order against the item.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before any further action is taken, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if there is any objection to inserting after the word "farmers," in line 24, the words "in the United States"?

Mr. GORE. No objection whatever.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment on page 72, line 24, after the word "farmers," it is proposed to insert "in the United States," so that, if amended, the amendment will read:

> And hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make studies of cooperation among farmers in the United States in matters of rural credits—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Oklahoma will agree to striking out the words "and sanitation" in line 25. That is a matter that belongs absolutely and wholly to the Public Health Service. If the Department of Agriculture should undertake to investigate the question of sanitation among the farmers of the United States, $50,000 would be a bagatelle, because you would have to send out physicians to make those investigations. I think it would better come out of the provision.

Mr. GORE. I do not think there will be any conflict between what the Department of Agriculture has in view under this amendment and the work done by the other departments or bureaus of the Government. I can see how this might be of a great deal of service in making known to the farmers simple ways and means of improving the sanitation and health of the community. In the interior, in the rural districts, I do not think the health officers render that service, or at least the service which is contemplated by this provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know how it may be in other parts of the country, but in the part of the country from which I come there is a health officer in every town of any considerable size, and then we have a State board of health. That board, under the law, cooperates with the Public Health Service. I really think that to turn over the matter of the public health to the Department of Agriculture is not good legislation.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is true, I suppose, in a great many States—it is in my own—that we have a health officer in every county—in every county seat, I take it—and, as the Senator suggests, you will probably find a health officer in every town, but this is not intended for the towns or cities. It is intended for the rural districts, and not to establish an elaborate system of sanitation, but simply to disseminate information, as I assume, which will enable the farmers themselves, by cooperative work, to clean up their communities.

Mr. GALLINGER. Seriously, I apprehend that the Senator will agree with me that the Department of Agriculture would have to send physicians out into the agricultural regions to investigate this matter. Does the Senator really think that in connection with the other matters that are to be investigated under this appropriation very much work could be done with $50,000?

Mr. GORE. I may say that the Committee on Agriculture recently recommended the appropriation of half a million dollars for the extermination of hog cholera. The Senate passed that bill without a word, without a question. It has often been said that Congress is more concerned about the health of pigs than about the health of human beings. I do not believe the imputation is true. We spend a great deal of money to exterminate diseases among cattle. I think human beings are quite as important as cattle. This bill carries a quarter of a million dollars for the study of diseases of cereals—grain, wheat, oats—and it can not be said that human beings are of less consequence than cereals.

Sanitation in this country has been seriously neglected. If the existing authorities have been armed with sufficient power and sufficient money, they have not accomplished all that can be done in that direction. They need reenforcement. If this, by any chance, will reenforce that service, and will assist in removing the causes of disease, it is certainly very desirable.

The time will come when civilized man will not continue to suffer from preventable diseases. That folly will be remitted to savages and barbarians. It is the worst of all follies for civilized human beings to die or to suffer from diseases which can be prevented. I assume that the object of this appropriation is to enable the farmers throughout the country to cooperate and to remove the cause of disease and to prevent disease. There is a good deal of sense in the suggestion that prevention is better than cure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will make the suggestion that the appropriations in this bill to which the Senator has referred for diseases of cattle and other live stock are properly under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture, however, has no more to do with the public health of the people of this country than he has to do with the last eclipse of the moon. It is simply taking a function from a department of the Government which is thoroughly equipped for that work, and to which we give adequate and liberal appropriations—sometimes I have thought almost extravagant appropriations—and transferring it to a department of the Government which has no connection whatever with the proposed investigation.

I move to strike out the two words "and sanitation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 72, line 25, after the words "rural credits," it is proposed to strike out the words "and sanitation."

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I have been trying to get the scope of the provision. Is it proposed that the Federal Government shall employ health officers under the Department of Agriculture to perform the same functions that the health officers perform who are employed by the States in the various cities and counties in the United States?

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if $50,000 will go very far in that work?

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggested a moment ago that if the Secretary of Agriculture really undertook this work he would have to send physicians all over the country into the rural districts, and the $50,000 would be a bagatelle. He might possibly cover a county in Kansas, which is bigger, I suppose, than the State of New Hampshire, or he might cover a fourth of the State of Iowa; but he certainly could not do very much in that direction. Yet this $50,000 is to be divided up, and rural credits are to be investigated, and other forms of cooperation in rural communities. It seems to me it is ridiculous.

Mr. BRISTOW. If I am correctly informed, the health officers who are employed under the direction of the various State boards of health examine the hotel kitchens and meat markets and butcher shops and packing houses that are located in their respective communities to see whether the proper sanitary rules are adopted by the proprietors. Is it proposed that the Secretary of Agriculture shall employ these health agents to go around and investigate the farmers' kitchens and barnyards and things of that kind to see whether the necessary sanitary rules are being carried out?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not think the committee amendment contemplates any such purpose or any such service as that. The Senator will observe that it says "studies of sanitation." I assume that it is to ascertain the causes of diseases—certain characters of diseases, at any rate—and where those causes are removable, perhaps one farmer could not remove them from the community, but perhaps by cooperation the causes could be to a great extent removed and the health of the community improved and safeguarded against the recurrence of like disease. I think that is a most important service.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Federal Government is going into the public-health business, does not the Senator really think it should do it through the proper channel that now exists instead of having it duplicated? We already have the Public Health Service, and now it is proposed to have the Department of Agriculture do the same work.

Mr. GORE. I have no disposition to impair the existing service, but I assume that the present organization would not be adequate to bring about cooperation among farmers, perhaps, in isolated communities, where through cooperation they could greatly improve the sanitation of the settlement. I do not think this service should be neglected because there is another bureau which looks after another branch of public sanitation. The truth is that there are possibilities of improvement in a great many lines of sanitation.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator would segregate the different localities, then? The Public Health Service would be confined to cities, would it, and the Agricultural Department would take care of the health of the rural communities?

Mr. GORE. By no means at all; but I do not seem to be able to make myself clear to the Senator. I think there is a field of service where, through cooperation of the neighbors living in a community, they can do much to remove the cause of disease and to improve the health of the community.

Mr. BRISTOW. How many people is it contemplated will be employed and paid, and are they to be under the civil service or are they to be selected at the discretion of the head of the department?

Mr. GORE. I will send to the desk a memorandum sent to me by the department, touching this amendment, which will shed some light upon the purposes and objects which they have in mind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield that it may be read?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the memorandum.

The Secretary read as follows:

STUDY OF RURAL ORGANIZATIONS.

On page 72, after line 22, insert the following:

"And hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make studies of cooperation among farmers in matters of rural credits and sanitation and of other forms of cooperation in rural communities; to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information growing out of these studies, in order to provide a basis for broader utilization of results secured by the research, experimental, and demonstration work of the Department of Agriculture, agricultural colleges, and State experiment stations; and to employ such persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere as the Secretary may consider necessary, $50,000."

This amendment was passed over at the suggestion of Senator KENYON.

For the past six or eight months the department has been engaged in some important studies having to do with organized effort on the part of farmers in advancing their interests financially and socially. The work has been conducted to this time without expense to the Government. It is now believed, however, that sufficient results have been secured to show that there is an important field to cover and that the projects are of such a nature as to make it advisable for the Government to wholly finance them. There is an extensive field yet practically untouched in matters of organized and cooperative effort in connection with rural credits and rural finances, rural sanitation, problems of community interest in fostering rural schools, better roads, transportation of farm products, purchasing of farm supplies, securing and the utilization of farm labor, etc. Even though legislation may be enacted improving the farmers' opportunities for financing their operation, a great deal of educational work must be done in order that the fullest benefits of any legislation may be secured. It would seem to be a very proper function of this department to do this educational work, and to do it properly the necessary facts must be gathered, digested, and used in the most effective manner.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does not that propose to cover the same work that is now being authorized through the Public Health Service and the Commissioner of Education? I remember we had a bill here some time since in which it was proposed to enlarge the work of the Commissioner of Education by authorizing him to do a lot of things that he can not do now, and it increased his appropriation. It seems to me, according to this, that the Secretary of Agriculture wants to start out with the Agricultural Department covering those two fields. Would it not be more practical legislation just to connect the Public Health Service and the Bureau of Education with this department and let the Secretary of Agriculture take charge of those divisions of Government?

Mr. WORKS and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator from California and then to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Kansas that we passed a law two years ago, or nearly that, extending the authority of the Health Department to this very matter of sanitation, and that department now has full authority to conduct any investigations or efforts to educate the people along sanitary lines.

Mr. SMOOT. Even to going into the homes of the people.

Mr. WORKS. It would simply be confusing the two if we were to attempt to extend that authority now to the Agricultural Department.

Mr. BRISTOW. It seems to me this appropriation of $50.000 ought to be stricken out. I can not understand why we are going into everything from an attack on prairie dogs to the curing of diseases and the appointment of physicians to instruct the wives of farmers in order to preserve the health of the community. If there is anything this bill has not covered, I have not been able to find it, except a Senator suggested to me this morning that there was one thing that was left out, and that was the snapping turtles, and he said he thought he would offer an amendment appropriating $50.000 for the destruction of snapping turtles, so that they would not destroy as many wild ducks as they do.

It seems to me that we ought to stop somewhere, and we ought not to encroach on the province of all the other departments. If the Secretary of Agriculture is to take charge of the education of the public and the health of the public, then we ought simply to merge the Bureau of Education and the Health Department and put them under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, and let him administer the laws that are already provided.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am not going to occupy more than a few minutes; simply to register my protest against the disposition of each department to encroach upon the jurisdiction of every other department. If the Senate is to humor that tendency, which seems to pervade all the departments of the Government now, there will be no limit to the appropriation bills. They have already grown to alarming proportions. I am not considered, I think, by Members of the Senate, as a very economical Senator in public expenditures. Indeed, I have always entertained the opinion that the Government ought to be liberal in appropriations for necessary and useful objects. But I must insist that we should discontinue useless appropriations, and I can not imagine any appropriation more useless, more absolutely unproductive of good, than the appropriation contained in this paragraph of the bill.

The Agricultural Department has an ample field in which to work without encroaching upon the Public Health Service and without encroaching upon the banking service. We have a department of the Government devoted to the development of the banking interests. We have a committee of the Senate now engaged in the work of perfecting plans for a rural-credit system. The Committee on Agriculture need not encroach upon the work of that committee. We have a Banking and Currency Committee that is amply able to deal with it, and which will deal with it in due time, and effectively deal with it in the interest of the farmers of the country.

But I do protest against the Committee on Agriculture intruding itself into the work of the Banking and Currency Commission and into the work of the Public Health Service. We have a splendid Public Health Service; it has a large staff of well-trained men, and Congress has provided ample money for it. It is required by the law of the land to do exactly what is provided for in this little paragraph. It simply means the absorption of that much of the people's money without any good whatever. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had in mind several amendments to this paragraph, but understanding that a point of order is to be made against it I will refrain from offering them at this time. If the point of order should not be sustained—and I think it ought to be sustained—I will then have something further to say.

But in the matter of the Public Health Service I want to pay in a very few words a tribute to that service and to the marvelous work which it has been doing and that it is doing to-day. It will be recalled that human life has been extended, I think, several years in the last quarter of a century directly through the efforts of the medical profession to increase the sanitary conditions of the country, including the rural population.

Mr. President, when the French were endeavoring to build the Panama Canal it was said that from malarial fevers of various types a human life was sacrificed to every sleeper that was laid on the railroad. That was an exaggeration, no doubt, but the mortality rates were so enormous as to alarm the civilized world almost. When we undertook that work a gentleman connected with the Public Health Service, Col. Gorgas, was sent there, and he applied the very means that are being used in every community in the United States to-day in the matter of improving the health of those employees. What has been the result? Mr. President, during the building of that canal there have been 98,785 cases of malarial fever and there have been out of that number 743 deaths. The world has never known of such a record in the matter of protecting the public health and of saving human life. What is true of the work that was done on the Canal Zone is true in every community in the United States at the present time.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator will pardon me for interrupting him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is it not a fact that the malaria at Panama is of the most malignant type and has been a frightfully disastrous disease?

Mr. GALLINGER. It certainly was.

Mr. BRISTOW. Before the United States took charge.

Mr. GALLINGER. There were tens of thousands of deaths when the French were undertaking to dig the canal.

Mr. WARREN. Even before that, when the California immigrants passed over the Isthmus, nearly all suffered from malaria and typhoid fever, and the deaths at times exceeded those whose lives were spared. The Isthmus was considered the most unhealthful locality known, and yet modern science, inventions, and accomplishments in medical practice have made possible the result just announced by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. There was the same result. So I am unwilling that this great health service, which is under the direction of one of the departments of the Government, and we having a committee of the Senate to deal with the subject, should be encroached upon by any other department of the Government, which in the very nature of things has no equipment to do as good work as is being done by the Public Health Service.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I supposed the Senator was just closing.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was going to say that unless the entire paragraph goes out I shall ask that the question be taken upon the motion I made a moment ago—to strike out the words "and sanitation."

Mr. WORKS. The statement has been made in the Senate a good many times and has been published in the newspapers that we are expending a great deal of money to preserve the health of the hog and nothing for the preservation of human health. Some time ago I introduced a resolution asking for information from the Secretary of the Treasury on that subject. Quite an extended report was made showing that we are expending now in the preservation of the public health over $20,000,000 a year.

The Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, of which I am a member, has had three or four different bills before it during the present session of Congress tending to improve the Health Service and to extend its authority particularly along the line of sanitation. One of them was a bill introduced authorizing investigation and field work in sections of the country where typhoid fever prevails with a view of stamping out typhoid fever, which must necessarily be done, as all of us know, by sanitation. That is the only means of exterminating the cause of the disease. That bill has been under consideration by that committee. It covers precisely the ground that is proposed to be covered by this provision in the Agricultural appropriation bill. If this is adopted, it is certain to bring about conflict between different departments of the Government.

I think we have a most excellent Health Service in this country and I suppose every State in the Union has a State board of health and a county board of health that are working in cooperation, as far as it may be done, with the national authorities.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, by specific legislation a few years ago we provided that the health boards of the several States should be not only in communication with but in actual consultation with the chiefs of the Health Service of the United States. So, I think, twice a year a meeting of that kind is held.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; there is a statute of that kind. One great question in dealing with this matter has been how far the National Government should go, how far it can legitimately go without trespassing upon the rights of the States, and that is a matter of considerable importance. While the doctors in the various States are perfectly willing to allow the Government to take charge of all the health affairs of the States, it must be apparent that this is no part of the work of the National Government, and that has been one of the things which has been under consideration by the committees dealing directly with this question. But I think we have gone about to the limit in authorizing the National Government to deal with the question of public health within the States, and there is absolutely no reason that I can see why the Agricultural Department should take hold of this matter in any way whatever.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the main question is where the money is to come from. Here is a bill increasing over the appropriations made by the House $1,545,000. The Indian appropriation bill was reported this morning from the Committee on Indian Affairs proposing an increase of $2,000,000. We have appropriated $35,000,000 for building a railroad in Alaska. Our appropriations this year will exceed $1,200,000,000 if we go on like this. When we pass these bills we ought to consider where is the money coming from. We will be sure to be called on for a deficiency, and therefore we ought to be cautious and consider all these items, and unless they are absolutely necessary they ought not to be voted into the appropriation bills.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will tell the Senator from North Carolina where the money is to come from. It is to come out of the pockets of the farmers of the United States. This Government costs a billion dollars a year, and the farmer pays more than his share of our national revenue and of our national expenditures. I have seen the estimates. Seventy per cent of our national revenue is derived from the farmer, and I doubt not the truth of the estimate.

It is true that we are within a few days to appropriate $130,000,000 for the Navy. For what purpose? To take human life; to send men to untimely graves. Yet $19,000,000 in the interest of the American farmer is complained of by reverend Senators here.

For the founders of the American prosperity and the authors of American wealth $50,000 is proposed to be appropriated to preserve human lives and $130,000,000 on the Navy to send them to their graves.

The Army appropriation bill will carry $95,000,000. Where, sir, is that money to come from? I join with the Senator from North Carolina in that question. It will come out of the pockets of the American farmer. Then do you grudge him this paltry $19,000,000?

This Government expends annually more than $400,000,000 on wars past, present, and to come—enough to build 400,000 homes costing a thousand dollars apiece, enough to build homes sufficient to house the population of a city like Philadelphia. What are the appropriations? Nineteen million dollars on the fruitful arts of peace, $400,000,000 on the bloody arts of war, $250,000,000 on our Army and our Navy for butchery and for bloodshed. You pass the naval appropriation in three hours. We spend as much on two battleships as the American farmer will receive through the pending bill. And yet Senators will debate this bill for weeks and contest every pitiful item looking to the betterment of the American farmer, and waste millions on public buildings to adorn and beautify cities and enhance the value of adjacent properties at the expense of the American farmer. Then Congress will appropriate $50,000,000 on rivers and harbors, $40,000,000 of which will be little better than sheer waste, twice as much as the agricultural bill carries, and strike from the bill $50,000, amongst other things, to study the health of rural communities and to enable the farmers to protect themselves against the chills and the fever and to be advised as to the ways and means alluded to by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] for affording themselves protection against malaria and against other preventable diseases.

Mr. President, the principles of scientific farming have long been known to scientists in agriculture, but so long as our light remained under a bushel it was unserviceable to the man who earns his daily bread by his daily toil. We have expended money to distribute bulletins throughout the United States to carry this information to the farmer on the farm. That has been serviceable, but we are extending the work. We are demonstrating practically before the eyes of the farmer the ways and means of scientific agriculture. That has been of infinitely greater service than the distribution of bulletins.

Now, so far as rural credit is concerned the farmers in the West pay from 20 to 25 per cent interest—it is outrageous—on the best security known to the financial world. In Germany to-day the bonds of their rural-credit concerns sell higher than the bonds of the German Empire bearing the same rate of interest. What has been evolved in Germany can be evolved in free and enlightened America. Would Senators grudge the American farmer who pays $500,000,000 interest a year $50,000 to distribute information upon this subject?

This must be a matter of education. It must be a matter of evolution here as it was in the Old World. It will take time. It will take experience. Immature experiments will result in disaster and in delaying the real relief which the oppressed and overburdened American farmer is subjected to pay. Yet Senators who vote with lavish hand a billion dollars a year on armies and navies, health, wealth, public buildings, useless rivers, stand here and fight a miserable appropriation of $50,000 to disseminate information amongst the American farmers concerning credit, concerning health, and concerning the lives of themselves and their families. It amounts to little more than sentencing many of these people to untimely deaths by withholding from them the information which will enable them to avert disease and to protract their pilgrimage here through this vale of tears, and it is too often a vale of tears when they plunder and impoverish the wealth producers for the benefit, in many instances, of those who neither toil nor spin.

I hope that the pending amendment of the committee will be adopted.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not think the farmers of the country want any deficiency in our Treasury. I think there are a great many items in this bill which the farmers of the country do not ask for. They are simply asked by bureaus, by clerks, and Secretaries for the purpose of having office-holders added. There are about 700,000 in this country to-day. I am for the farmers and everything they demand and want, but I know, if I know the people of this country aright, that they do not want a deficiency.

We have to appropriate for battleships, for the Army, and for the Navy, and those things. Will the Senator join me in cutting down these or other appropriations? I did not speak about this bill alone. I spoke specially in reference to the Indian appropriation bill and in reference to all the appropriation bills in order that we may come within our budget in the collection of revenues this year.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator I will join him in opposing the river and harbor bill. I have never voted for one of those bills since I have been in the Senate. I have never voted for a public-buildings bill since I have been in the Senate. I have never grudged the farmers the miserable pittance they receive out of the multiplied millions which they pour as a stream of gold into the National Treasury for the benefit of other classes than themselves.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if I thought this was going to do the farmer any good, I would not oppose it, but I am positive it will not do so. The Public Health Committee of this body had under consideration the question of making an appropriation for the study of typhoid fever, as referred to by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. That committee thought they could do no good whatever with a less appropriation than $500,000, and then to think of an appropriation of $50,000 divided between rural credit and sanitation! It is simply ridiculous to think that any good can come from it.

Mr. President, this bill ought to be referred back to the committee, in my opinion, and this same opinion has been expressed to me by other Senators. There are many things in it that should not be in an Agricultural appropriation bill. It ought to be sent back to the committee for its further consideration, and let them report a bill without so many questions that have no reference whatever to an Agricultural appropriation bill.

The very next paragraph proposes to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever, in his judgment, necessary, to lease for a term not exceeding 10 years a building or parts of buildings. The appropriation bill that was reported by the Committee on Appropriations this morning provides for the leasing of buildings for the Government, and in nearly every appropriation rents are limited to so much per square foot. Here we find the Committee on Agriculture reporting a bill authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever, in his judgment, necessary, to go to work and lease for a term of years a building—nothing as to what it shall be, where it shall be located, what class of building it shall be. That is only one item.

What is the next? For investigating the grading, weighing, and handling of naval stores. Why is that in this bill? What right has it in this bill? It is not germane to the bill at all.

In the very next paragraph we find the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to print and publish certain maps. Mr. President, the Appropriations Committee appropriates a lump sum of money every year for the printing of the Department of Agriculture. The estimate is brought to Congress, itemized statements are made as to what will be required for the printing in that department of the Government, hearings are had by the committee of both Houses of Congress. And now upon this bill we find the Committee on Agriculture authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to do certain printing of maps.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that if the Senate did right in this matter, instead of making points of order upon these items which are not germane to the bill they ought to refer it back to the committee for further consideration.

Now, Mr. President, I shall make a point of order against this amendment.

Mr. BRADY. Will the Senator withhold his point of order for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, before the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] makes his point of order, I wish to say a word with reference to this item in the agricultural appropriation bill.

An appropriation of $50,000 to be made for the benefit of the farmers seems to be very large, indeed; but if it were made for the purpose of digging a canal down on some eastern seacoast, it would be a very proper appropriation. Within the last week I have sat in this Chamber and listened to Senators for an hour showing cause, as they thought, why it was proper to increase an appropriation from something like a million dollars to $2,000,000 for digging a 14-mile ditch down on the eastern seacoast, where they can go around in three hours, while the farmers of the West and of the South are compelled to raise their grain and ship it 2,000 miles at rates dictated by men in New York.

I am not in favor of extravagance in any way; I have never raised my voice in favor of a bill to appropriate a single dollar in this body; but now the Appropriations Committee modestly recommend the appropriation of $50,000. For what purpose? To authorize the Secretary of Agriculture "to make studies of cooperation among farmers in matters of rural credits, and of other forms of cooperation."

I wish to say simply a word relative to rural credits. We have just passed a banking law. I wish to ask Members of this body whether or not that banking law was passed for the benefit of the farmer or for the benefit of the banker? The distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] made the statement that we had a Banking and Currency Committee that could handle this matter splendidly. They have given us a law, and the Senator who presented the bill stood on this floor and stated that it was a banker's bill, and that it was going to be passed in that way in order that the bankers have control of it; and what was the result? I wish to say to you that the farmers are beginning to get some information in regard to it. They are studying it; they are finding out in one way and another that they are not securing their just dues. Only yesterday I received a letter from a farmer inclosing me a resolution passed by the bankers of a certain city. The resolution was signed by 12 bankers. I shall not call their names, but will simply read the resolution:

Whereas the provisions of the new currency law render time paper necessary in order that members may derive the full benefit of discount privileges—

These are the member banks—not the farmer—

and

Whereas under the provisions of the currency law interest on paper presented for discount must be paid in advance—

The farmer has to pay his interest in advance now—

and

Whereas it is already in most parts of the country the prevailing practice to discount customers' paper: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the undersigned agree that on and after April 1 they will, in so far as possible, discount their customers' commercial paper instead of collecting interest on same at maturity, as is now the prevailing local custom; and the undersigned further agrees that in case it is found necessary to draw any notes on demand, interest on same will be collected monthly.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRADY. I do.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Idaho himself think that there is any provision in the banking bill requiring the interest on a note to be paid in advance?

Mr. BRADY. This resolution indicates that, in order to get the full benefit of the discounts, they must do it.

Mr. REED. I know the resolution which the Senator has read says that; but if there is any such provision in the banking law it certainly escaped my attention. The board of control in that system has not yet been organized.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But that board has the power to make that regulation.

Mr. REED. The board might have the power to make many regulations, but surely it ought not to be assumed that they will make them until they do so. This resolution which the Senator has presented which was passed by these bankers recites the fact that that provision is in the law, when, as a matter of fact, there is no such provision in the law. If these bankers are passing such resolutions, they must be doing it on their own responsibility. I think I ought to say that, so that there will not be any misapprehension about the terms of the law.

Mr. BRADY. They make this statement and they are responsible men, and they give notice to that effect.

Mr. REED. They are trying to lay their own designs and purposes and schemes onto the currency law, I think.

Mr. BRADY. They make the statement very positively here, and they are perfectly responsible bankers. They say:

Under the provisions of the currency law interest on paper presented for discount must be paid in advance.

Is that correct, or is it not correct?

Mr. REED. There is no such provision in the currency law, unless my recollection is completely at fault.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Missouri that I am a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, and I know that there is no such provision in the act called the banking and currency act.

Mr. BRADY. Regardless of whether the farmers have to pay interest in advance or not to the discount board, or to the central reserve bank, this is the notice that they receive from their bankers. I claim that it is not only of no benefit, but that the law is a detriment to the farmer.

I understand that the majority agreed that we were to have a rural-credits bill. I am also advised that action on that bill has been postponed. I am not criticizing anybody for this, but during that time the farmer is going to have an opportunity of studying a bill that is for his benefit; and it does seem to me that we, as the representatives of the people of the United States, should be willing that the farmers should have some opportunity to study rural credits. There is no other way that the farmers can get this information than by gathering together and discussing the matter in an informal and in a formal way, by exchanging ideas with each other, and coming in contact with men who understand their conditions and needs. The Committee on Agriculture is only asking for $50,000 for the millions and millions of farmers we have in the United States to-day.

It seems to me that if we are going to practice economy we should not commence practicing it on the farmer. As the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] well said, we are proposing to spend more for two battleships than this whole appropriation bill aggregates. We have bills before the Senate every day, which are passed under a suspension of the rules, which appropriate more money for local purposes only than this bill appropriates for the benefit of all the farmers in the United States.

Within the week we passed a bill authorizing the expenditure of $75,000 for putting a new covering or front on the side of a post-office building in an eastern city, which is already erected, and is capable of handling the business just as well without that covering on it as it would be with it. That was an appropriation of $75,000 for one little town. I am not objecting to that; the committee thought it was necessary. But when we do that—for it may be of benefit to the people—why should we raise such a great objection to spending $50,000 so that the farmers may secure some valuable information that will enable them to come to us next year when Congress convenes and help us frame a bill by giving us their ideas of the terms of such a bill as would benefit them. It seems to me there is no question but that that is a fair, a just, and an equitable amount to appropriate in this bill, and that it is proposed to be appropriated for a good purpose.

There have been a great many questions raised here about this bill and its wonderful extravagance. There may be some items in it which are extravagant, but they are not many, and this is not one of them. The committee gave this bill fair, honest, and careful consideration. There may be, as Senators have suggested, some things which have been put into the bill which should not have been put in; but when we come to pass some of the other appropriation bills proposing to appropriate $130,000,000, $95,000,000, and similar sums, I want to say that I, as a representative of the farmers of the West, am going to raise some points of order myself.

If we can not have $50,000 for the purpose of diffusing useful knowledge among the farmers, I ask you why we should have $130,000,000 for the purpose of building ships and maintaining a Navy and $95,000,000 for maintaining an Army to kill human beings?

The farmer produces that which brings health and happiness to every home. He works from dawn until dark. He does not enjoy the advantages that you have in your cities, and he does not have an opportunity to secure information relative to the business methods that the business men and the men living in cities enjoy. You should not deny him this small pittance that perhaps will enable him to secure information that will save him many dollars of his hard-earned money.

It is the farmer that produces the real wealth of this Nation. The soil is the basis of all real wealth, and we have been talking for years of the "back-to-the-farm" movement. There is no use of sending our young generations back to the farm, unless we provide them ways and means so that they can secure some commercial benefits from their labor.

We are the greatest agricultural nation on earth, and there is no country in the world that has made a brighter or a greater record than we have. No country has done more to advance the moral, the material, and the intellectual welfare of its people than this Nation of ours; and who has helped to do this? The farmer. We all know that the farmer has contributed his full share, and the only way we can maintain the high standard of American life that we all hope to maintain is by the diffusion of knowledge, and we can do it in no other or better way than to make this small appropriation.

And I feel that we are doing the farmer an injustice when we, as you might say, quarrel here for days over small appropriations for the benefit of millions and millions of our people, while on the same days we suspend the rules and give $75,000, $100,000, and $150,000 to different communities for purely local purposes.

Nineteen million dollars is a very small amount for the millions of farmers in this Nation in comparison to other appropriations we are making here every day. We can not advance the interests of this country in any better way than to encourage the farmer, and there is nothing in the world that they need to understand, and understand better, than the subject of rural credits.

I sincerely hope a point of order will not be sustained, and that an appropriation of $50,000 for rural credits will be written into the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I think that I ought perhaps to explain the bearing of this appropriation on the rural-credits bill. The Senate subcommittee, in connection with the House Subcommittee on Banking and Currency, has been considering the entire subject of rural credits for the past four months.

There are two parts of the rural-credits legislation. One of them relates to long-term mortgages on land and the other to what are called personal credits. The subcommittee has prepared, and there has been introduced into the Senate and the House, a comprehensive measure dealing with long-term mortgage credits, and that, I presume, will come before the full Committee on Banking and Currency next week.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I ask my colleague a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from New Hampshire yield to his colleague?

Mr. HOLLIS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator exactly what provision is made for so-called long-term mortgages? As an illustration, the Senator knows that in our State mortgages carry a rate of interest of 5 per cent. Does that provision for so-called long-term mortgages relate to the rate of interest on them, or in what way does it benefit the farmer? I simply ask for information.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, in my judgment the bill proposed will not lower the rate of interest in New Hampshire, where the current rate is 5 per cent on loans secured on land.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to my colleague that I have not any apprehension of that, but I simply wanted to differentiate and to know precisely what the bill did contemplate for other sections of the country.

Mr. HOLLIS. As my colleague is aware, loans in New Hampshire made at 5 per cent, particularly those made by the savings banks, are made on demand; so that the borrower is at the mercy of the bank at any time the bank or the one who loans the money desires to call the money. Any time the banks need it, they can call for it. Under the new system as proposed the loans will be on the amortization plan, on long terms. The period of the loan may run as high as 20 years, a small percentage of the principal being paid each year with the interest, so that at the end of the term, if it is 20 years, for example, the loan will be paid up by making small payments. That is the only great advantage that I see for New England. But in the South and West, where interest rates for various reasons are high, it is believed that the rates will be greatly reduced.

The bill to which I have referred covers long-term mortgages on land. The committee considered very carefully the matter of personal credits. In Europe the farmers have had inaugurated for them, or they have contrived for themselves, a system of cooperative credits, under which a group of farmers will form an association and become mutually liable for each other's loans. It is believed that in this country that would not work as well as it does in Europe, for many reasons, among others that in Europe farmers live in communities, while in this country they are widely scattered; in Europe the farmers in any locality are of the same nationality, while here they are likely to be of various nationalities; in Europe they have largely the same religion, while here that is frequently not the case; in Europe they have grown used to helping each other, while in this country they have not. It is believed that under existing law farmers, if they know how to help each other by cooperation, may obtain as much accommodation as they are entitled to; and I understand that it is the purpose of this paragraph to teach the farmers how to avail themselves of the present law, to form cooperative societies, and to obtain the credit to which they are fairly entitled as an aggregate.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. BRADY. I simply want to ask the Senator at this point if he does not believe that the $50,000 to be appropriated by this clause of the pending bill could be used in a very beneficial way in enabling the farmers to study the best method of cooperation in order to secure the benefits of the bill which the Senator has introduced?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do most decidedly believe that; and I was about to say that I myself drew and proposed, as an amendment to the bill that was introduced on Tuesday last, a provision substantially like this, authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make studies of cooperation among farmers in matters of rural credits, cooperative buying and selling, and other forms of mutual help, and to diffuse the information thus obtained. That received the hearty approval of the subcommittee; but on looking it up we found that the same thing was contained in this bill, and we thought it was better to leave it out of our bill, and leave our bill what it purports to be on its face, a long-term mortgage bill. I do most heartily believe that the best aid we can give the farmer along the lines of cooperative personal credit at this time is to give him instruction, so that he will know how to use the credit facilities that are now available to him if he will join with his neighbors in the effort. I am doubtful how far it may succeed, but I think the effort ought to be made; and I think this is the most useful and the least expensive way to make it. I am therefore in favor of this amendment, and I hope it will prevail.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if, in his experience with the banks of New Hampshire, it is true, as he states, that the bankers there rely upon the demand paper of the farmers for their liquid or quick assets?

Mr. HOLLIS. I will state that in my experience in connection with the savings banks for 15 years I have never known the farmer to be foreclosed where there was any reasonable chance for him to pay. The bankers keep their assets in such shape that they can call on other resources before they call on the farmer. I do not think that that is an evil in our part of the country; but, still, in the case of a panic or a great crisis it might place the man who is not, under ordinary circumstances, in any danger of having his loan called under some apprehension lest it might be called.

Mr. PAGE. I want to say to the Senator that in my experience none of that apprehension exists. As the Senator has said, in our savings banks we take demand paper, but in all the panics through which we have ever passed, so far as my knowledge goes, we have never relied upon the farmer as the man to whom we go for money when we have to check a run. We have another class of paper, business paper, paper that is secured by bank stock, paper that is secured by bonds, which we call quick assets; and I have never yet known a demand loan against a farmer called in any time of panic or distress.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then, if the Senator will yield, I should like to ask him why it is that the banks always make such loans to farmers on demand so that they can call them if they want to do so?

Mr. PAGE. Because a banker dislikes to carry in his package of notes a large amount of overdue paper. A farmer does not regard his promise to pay at a given time as a merchant does. He gives his paper, and when he gives it, if he makes it payable in a year, he understands that at the end of the year he is not going to pay it unless he wants to do so; so that, instead of having a lot of loans all of which are overdue, they are all made payable on demand, but the farmer understands that in no case will the money be demanded so long as he keeps his security good until the note is paid.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. JAMES addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. The Senator from Utah has made a point of order against this paragraph. The point of order I make is that that point of order is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just going to state the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Vice President was not in the Chamber at the time the point of order was entered.

Mr. SMOOT. I make the point of order against this amendment, that it adds a new item to an appropriation bill, which has not been offered by way of an amendment and referred to a committee at least one day before the bill was considered; again, the amendment has never been estimated for; again, it increases an appropriation already contained in the bill; and, again, the amendment does not directly relate to the subject of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether this item was submitted to the Committee on Appropriations one day previous to to-day?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it was not introduced formally into the Senate and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The department, I may say, submitted what might be styled a supplemental estimate, which was prepared and transmitted to the committee; and for that reason the committee adopted it and reported it as a part of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a supplemental estimate must come from the Secretary of the Treasury, and not from the head of any other department. That is the only kind of an estimate that can be considered in legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire whether the estimate came from the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GORE. It came from the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator if the Secretary of Agriculture sent to Congress an estimate for this amount?

Mr. GORE. It was not included in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry in reference to the point of order. The point of order has been made upon several distinct grounds. One of those grounds is that the amendment is not germane to the subject of the bill. While those words were not used, that was the substance of one branch of the point of order. Such a point of order must be submitted, under the rules, to a vote of the Senate. My parliamentary inquiry is, Where a number of points of order are included under one objection, which embraces the suggestion that the amendment is not germane, whether the whole matter ought not to be submitted to the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so that there shall be no vote taken upon that, I will simply withdraw that part of the point of order.

Mr. JAMES. Would not the Senator be willing to submit the point of order to the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Chair first rule upon the other points of order that I have made against the provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any doubt that this item has never been before the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. GORE. I do not understand the inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The inquiry is, as to whether there is any doubt as to this item ever having been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. GORE. I do not think it has been.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this item naturally would not go to the Committee on Appropriations, but to the Committee on Agriculture. In my opinion, however, the first point made by the Senator from Utah is not well taken, because I think every Vice President has ruled and it has uniformly been held that where a standing committee having jurisdiction of an appropriation bill makes a recommendation in the shape of a reported amendment, that that avoids the necessity of having the amendment submitted to it beforehand. As to the other point, in regard to there being no estimate for this item, I think perhaps the point may be well taken, because the kind of estimate we understand to be meant and the estimate the rule has in contemplation is an estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Congress. I assume that the estimate in this instance came in the form of a letter or request from the Secretary of Agriculture to the committee. The chairman of the committee will correct me if I am wrong about that, but I think that is the fact. I think, therefore, the determination of the point of order rests upon whether this is general legislation and whether it came in the form of an estimate.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to inquire of the Senator if that would apply to a committee amendment like this?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. A standing committee may make a suggested amendment without the same having been referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, certainly. A standing committee can send in an amendment. If not, where would we be as to these——

Mr. NORRIS. That is the point I wanted to make.

Mr. WARREN. I say the first point—that it was not introduced a day beforehand—is not sound, in my judgment.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator. I do not think it is sound.

SEVERAL SENATORS. The Senator withdrew that point.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not the point the Senator withdrew. The point the Senator withdrew is the one that requires the Presiding Officer to submit it to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President. The one I withdrew is found in section 2 of Rule XVI, which says:

> 2. All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are considered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator has withdrawn that point, then the point that seemed to be in the mind of the Chair has been withdrawn, for the Chair asked the question whether the amendment had ever been referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me to finish, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to where we would be if every amendment to an appropriation bill that was brought in by the Committee on Appropriations—and for this purpose this is the Committee on Appropriations, so far as agriculture is concerned—had to be introduced on the floor and stand over a day. There are sometimes 150 or 160 or 170 amendments made to a bill. I remember the ruling made during the incumbency of the chair by the late Senator Frye, who was President pro tempore. He was the first one I heard make the conclusion—and I have since heard the same conclusion made—when an amendment has been duly recommended by a committee, that makes it in order so far as that is concerned; but when it comes to the estimates, in my judgment, nothing is an estimate unless it is from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is required by law, as I understand, that at a certain time the Secretary of the Treasury shall receive reports from the heads of the various departments—the different Secretaries. He then makes up what is known as a Book of Estimates. That Book of Estimates is sent down to the Appropriations Committee. That is known as the estimates.

My understanding is that everything is subject to a point of order that has not been estimated for in the estimates coming through the Secretary of the Treasury. Every department of the Government sends its requests to the Secretary of the Treasury and they are considered together, and he sends down the final estimates. A mere letter from the head of some department is not an estimate. It is only a request from the department, and is always subject to a point of order.

Mr. WARREN. And if a supplemental estimate is sent in, it should be from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, of course. That is the rule.

Mr. WARREN. I take no issue as to the amendment. I am simply stating what I understand to be the rule and what has been the practice.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say that when Senator Hale was chairman of the Appropriations Committee I know that several times I had an amendment offered to a bill by a standing committee, and when it was questioned here on the floor, and I was asked if I had offered the amendment in the Senate and had it referred to the Appropriations Committee, and I stated that that had not been done, it went out on a point of order. That rule has been held in this body time and time again.

Mr. WARREN. Not when the Committee on Appropriations have sent it here as their amendment; but where it comes from another committee or from an individual, of course, it has to go before the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it has so gone on the appropriation bills.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—— [After a pause.] I suppose I am recognized. The Chair seems to be amused about something. I should like to be recognized by the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be pleased to hear from the Senator from Washington. However, the question is not debatable unless the Chair presents it to the Senate. The Chair was simply amused at the debate that was going on when the question was not debatable, and was not amused at the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad to know that; and as long as the matter has been debated by some Senators, I take it for granted that I may say a few words about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not the slightest objection to the Senator from Washington saying what he chooses.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I simply wish to call the Chair's attention to the explicit and specific rule upon the question. I do not know what precedents the Senator from Utah has in mind; but under the standing rules of the Senate it can not be that the estimates referred to must be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, because the rule says——

Mr. OVERMAN. That is not according to a rule. It is according to a statute of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield right on that point?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that even if it is not an estimate, under the rule, the amendment having been suggested by a standing committee, it is not subject to a point of order.

Paragraph 1 of Rule XVI, near the end of it, after enumerating several things that must appear in order to have an amendment to an appropriation bill in order, makes certain exceptions, and here is one of them:

> Or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

That is one of the exceptions. Another one of the exceptions is:

> Or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, even if it requires an estimate, it does not follow that it has to come from the Secretary of the Treasury. The head of a department can make it. The point I wanted to make for the Senator from Washington, however, was that this being an amendment coming from a standing committee, it is in order although no estimate ever has been made.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator has read the very rule that I had risen to call to the attention of the Chair. I agree with him entirely. I also agree with the view of the matter taken by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who has had as long an experience here as any Senator in this body.

Both the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Wyoming agree that altogether aside from the question of what constitutes an estimate, or from what department the estimate must come, in this case it is in order, because the appropriation has been moved on behalf of a standing committee. Particularly would that be cogent where the committee that approved it is the committee having control of appropriations in these matters.

Furthermore, however, even if it should be held that an estimate was necessary, it would be impossible to say that the estimate must come from the Secretary of the Treasury when the rule says "in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments." It can not be confined to the head of one department when it says "or some one of the departments."

Of course, it is true—and I take it for granted that that will not be disputed—as the Senator from Wyoming has already said, so far as concerns the point made by the Senator from Utah, that this amendment must be referred a day in advance to the Appropriations Committee, that the Appropriations Committee here is the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. That is the only committee, or, at least, it is one of the committees, that has authority to make appropriations in matters pertaining to the Department of Agriculture. It is not the custom and it is not necessary that any one of the items in the Agricultural appropriation bill shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if that were not true, every amendment in the Agricultural appropriation bill would have to be stopped and sent to the general Appropriations Committee, and there would be no use for the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is very true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one word further.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is illustrated by the fact that the same paragraph provides for the reference to the Committee on Commerce of matters referring to rivers and harbors, and the reference to the Post Office Committee of matters connected with post offices and post roads. They were put in at the time those were the only two committees that had charge of special appropriations.

I know all during the last Congress the practice was to refer a special amendment referring to the Agricultural Department, or to the Post Office Department, or to one of the other measures where a particular committee brought in the appropriation bill for that line of work, to the committee having the bill in charge, and not to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The whole matter is made clear, I think, by the rule itself, which makes an exception of certain committees which, having bills before them, have jurisdiction over the appropriations. The rule specifies those committees, and among them is the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The rule reads:

> All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except the following bills, which shall be severally referred as herein indicated, namely: The bill making appropriations for rivers and harbors, to the Committee on Commerce; the agricultural bill, to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; the Army and the Military Academy bills, to the Committee on Military Affairs; the Indian bill, to the Committee on Indian Affairs; the naval bill, to the Committee on Naval Affairs; the pension bill, to the Committee on Pensions; the Post Office bill, to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The distinction is illustrated by the case of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I presume the point the Senator from Utah makes would be applicable if the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds undertook to make an appropriation. The rule which he cites might then be applicable, requiring that appropriation to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; but it can not be applicable to the Agricultural appropriation bill, because the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is expressly excepted by the rule itself.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to the Senator, I wish to call his attention to section 2 of the rule. Now, see what it says:

> All amendments to general appropriation bills—

Those are the appropriation bills that the Senator read, in paragraph 1 of this rule—> moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are considered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There is only one Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will answer the Senator from Utah by referring again to the exception which is contained in the very same rule from which he is now reading.

In the first paragraph, before using the language he has read from the second paragraph, it makes an exception of the Agricultural Committee:

All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except the following bills—

And that exception is carried throughout Rule XVI.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me there, simply for an explanation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. It will support the Senator's contention.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. The rule that is being read is a rule that was adopted when we had but one appropriations committee. Therefore, when we gave the other committees the power to appropriate directly, necessarily the rule would apply to the other committees, because they become appropriation committees over the subject which was referred to them.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me for a suggestion along the same line?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. In addition to what the Senator has said, I wish to suggest that the contention made by the Senator from Utah, that these amendments would have to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, loses all force when we consider the fact that no one will deny that the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction of any one of these amendments. How foolish it would be, before we could consider it here, to refer an amendment proposed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to the Committee on Appropriations, when we know that under the rules the Committee on Appropriations has no authority and no right to give it any consideration and no jurisdiction whatever over it. The Agricultural Committee is one of the appropriation committees of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the appropriations committee for this purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. And the only one.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the only one; and it handles the bill alone.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As stated by the Senator from Wyoming, that has been the universal practice of the Senate.

Mr. JAMES. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no time now to ascertain whether or not there has been an amendment of paragraph 1 of Rule XVI. The Chair believes there must have been an amendment since its original adoption, because there is a manifest incongruity between paragraph 1 and paragraph 2. There are certain bills which go to specific committees under paragraph 1, amendments to which do not go to those committees under paragraph 2, but go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Chair has no means of ascertaining now, and will not take the time of the Senate to ascertain, whether or not there have been amendments to paragraph 1, and whether such an amendment to paragraph 1 would be construed as being likewise an amendment to paragraph 2, so as to avoid the plain language of paragraph 2, namely, that this amendment should have been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Chair believes that that is the only question involved in the point of order; and not having information upon the amendment which might be construed as amending paragraph 2, the Chair submits the question for the decision of the Senate.

The question is, Is the amendment in order? [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide. All those who believe the amendment to be in order will rise. [After a pause.] All those who believe the amendment to be not in order will rise. [After a pause.] The amendment is decided by the Senate to be in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, speaking to the point of order, I desire to say that I personally abstained from voting on either side because I am paired, and I considered that the pair held on the division.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, it is too late to make the point of order suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire. The Senate has already decided that the paragraph is in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the point that was made.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator from Utah suggested this same point of order originally, and the Senate is presumed to have passed upon every phase of the question when it decided that the amendment was in order. It is too late, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that I did not make the point of order that it was general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator made that suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think I did.

Mr. JAMES. I think the Senator did, though I am not sure about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask that the Reporter's minutes on the question that was just submitted to the Senate may be read. As I understand, it was whether this amendment was in order.

Mr. JAMES. That is right.

Mr. GALLINGER. It must have been whether it was in order in view of the point of order that was made against it; but it seems to me impossible that that would prevent a Senator from making a further point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to have the Reporter turn back to his notes and read the point of order made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. SMOOT. I make the point of order against this amendment that it adds a new item to an appropriation bill which has not been offered by way of an amendment and referred to a committee at least one day before the bill was considered; again, the amendment has never been estimated for; again, it increases an appropriation already contained in the bill; and, again, the amendment does not directly relate to the subject of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believes that when a point of order is submitted to the Senate the ruling is upon the reasons given by the Senator raising the point of order and includes nothing else. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is properly made, and the Chair again submits the question of order to the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish to make simply one suggestion.

I am not very particular, but somewhat indifferent, about the question before the Senate; but if it be true that one point of order can be raised and passed upon, and then another, and then another, separately—or, in other words, if it be not true that when a point of order is raised against a provision in a bill it settles the whole question, and that Senators can not hold in reserve other points of order, so as to inject one after the other, indefinitely—it would be the most fruitful means of filibustering that I can imagine, provided you could get enough votes to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to my good friend from Missouri that that could not be done indefinitely, because there are only about three provisions in the rule upon which points of order can be made. But, Mr. President, if this question is to be submitted to the Senate it is so clear in my mind that this is general legislation, and it is also so clear in my mind that a majority of the Senate seem to be in favor of the provision, that I withdraw the point of order I made.

Mr. GORE. I wish to express my appreciation of the Senator's action.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, unless some other point of order is to be made, I ask for action on the amendment I submitted some time ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 72, in the committee amendment as proposed, in line 25, after the words "rural credits," the Senator from New Hampshire moves to strike out the two words "and sanitation."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. JAMES and Mr. GORE. Division, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All those in favor of the amendment will rise. [After a pause.] Those opposed will rise. [After a pause.] The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee is agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if the officials to whom $50,000 is to be paid for this purpose are to be selected from the classified service or are we to add some more officials outside of the classified service?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that perhaps the Senator has overlooked the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture, in the letter which I had read to the Senate a few minutes ago, stated that this work had been in course of performance for some six or seven months past, and I assume that the same machinery which has been used heretofore will be used in the future. It will not create any elaborate system of machinery or any large number of appointees. It is simply to study the particular problems in the various localities and to advise the farmers how to cure the evils.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator's explanation is about what I anticipated. Of course it will add a few more good Democrats to the pay roll.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that so far as I have been able to discover during the past 12 months we have not had a Democrat appointed in the Agricultural Department, unless the Secretary is one.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know that is the usual observation that is made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am sorry to say that it is true, though, in this instance. I hope it will change.

Mr. GALLINGER. No doubt the Senator will get a few under this provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall try to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall not press my inquiry. If the Senator from Oklahoma is satisfied, I am.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should not like to be estopped by my silence. I will say that there are three appointive offices in the Department of Agriculture. Everything else, as I understand, is under the civil service. The Assistant Secretary, nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, is a Republican. The Chief of the Weather Bureau, nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, is a Republican. Only the Solicitor is a Democrat. That is 2 to 1, and that is a pretty good average for all.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator will agree that this provision will add a few more appointive offices.

Mr. GORE. I am not certain that it will; and if it does, I have sufficient faith in the activity of the Republicans to believe that they will get some of the offices.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma one further question. We are quite in the habit of making a provision of this kind, putting into the hands of some subordinates of the Government the duty of making investigations. Has the Senator any objection to limiting the time for a report—say, that the report shall be made to Congress not later than February 1, 1915?

Mr. GORE. I hope the Senator will not insist on that, because I am not able to answer whether that will be sufficient time or not. It will expire, anyway, under the terms of the bill, in the fiscal year.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was going to call attention to that. I think this is a permanent appropriation, because the Senator has added the word "hereafter."

Mr. GORE. I recall that the word "hereafter" is used.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that word ought to come out, because it makes it a permanent appropriation.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say to the Senator that it is my purpose to request the Secretary of Agriculture to advise the Senate at its next session as to those investigations which have been completed. I agree with the Senator that when an investigation has once been authorized it seems to be interminable in nearly every bill, and I do not favor that policy. If it is possible to prosecute this investigation and find out the facts, it ought to be done, and then the investigation ought to stop and the appropriation ought to stop. I hope that will be the case, not only in this instance but in a great many other instances under this bill and many other bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. If I do not offer the amendment I have suggested, and I have no disposition to do it if it is not agreeable to the Senator from Oklahoma, is the Senator willing to take out the word "hereafter," so as to make the appropriation merely apply to the next fiscal year?

Mr. GORE. It seems to me if it is really a deserving appropriation it ought to justify itself, and I shall not quarrel with the Senator about the word "hereafter."

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I move to strike it out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the words "and hereafter" and begin the word "the" with a capital.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the committee, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah insist on his motion, or merely that the yeas and nays shall be taken on the question whether the Senate will agree to the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the Chair can put it affirmatively, and then I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were orderd.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand the question, to vote "yea" is to sustain the amendment of the committee as amended?

The VICE PRESIDENT. As amended. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], who is necessarily absent, and withhold my vote.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] and withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and withhold my vote.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably absent on official business. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. That Senator has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming]. He is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], but with reference to this bill I understand certain measures in which he is interested and which he has explained to me. As to others, I am at liberty to vote. Where I disagree with him, I will refrain from voting during his absence. As to this question, I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I have voted uniformly on this bill against such appropriations. Therefore I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote the same way now. I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce a pair existing between the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 19, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 73, beginning with line 9, the committee proposes to insert the following:

That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever in his judgment it is clearly advantageous to the Government, may lease for terms not exceeding 10 years buildings or parts of buildings in the District of Columbia necessary for the accommodation of the Department of Agriculture: Provided, That each lease shall contain a provision that the same can be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture at any time on 30 days' notice.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish simply to say to the Senate that the renting of buildings in the District of Columbia is provided for in other appropriation bills, and this item has no place whatever in this appropriation bill. Therefore I make a point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GORE subsequently said:

Mr. President, my attention was momentarily diverted when the point of order made by the Senator from Utah was sustained by the Chair relating to the provision in the bill authorizing the Secretary to lease buildings for periods of 10 years.

I think the amendment was subject to the point of order. I regret, however, that the Senator felt impelled to raise the point. I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture stating that that amendment will save as much as $2,500 a year on a single building if the department is given the privilege of making long-time leases. I am sorry the Senator has deprived the department of that opportunity to economize.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have not deprived the Senate of an opportunity to economize in any way. I made the point of order simply because this item does not belong in the Agricultural appropriation bill. There is now pending before the Senate an appropriation bill where the question of renting buildings in the District of Columbia is taken care of; and any amendment that the Secretary of Agriculture wants to put on he can present to the Committee on Appropriations and have it put on the bill if it is going to economize in any way.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator's point was that this was new legislation. I do not know of any appropriation bill to which new legislation is properly referred. While I do not wish to be technical with the Senator, as he was within his rights in raising the point of order, he has deprived the Secretary of an opportunity to save $2,500 a year on a single building. I do not know how much he has. If he is willing to take the responsibility, of course I have no objection; but I do ask to have the letter of the Secretary upon the point, together with the remarks I have just submitted, printed just following the action of the Chair in sustaining the point of order.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LONG-TERM LEASES.

On page 73, after line 8, insert the following:

"That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever in his judgment it is clearly advantageous to the Government, may lease for terms not exceeding 10 years buildings or parts of buildings in the District of Columbia necessary for the accommodation of the Department of Agriculture: Provided, That each lease shall contain a provision that the same can be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture at any time on 30 days' notice."

This amendment was passed over at the request of Senator KENYON.

The proviso authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to lease buildings for the accommodation of the Department of Agriculture for a term of not exceeding 10 years when it is clearly to the advantage of the Government to make a lease for a term of years.

It is understood that other departments of the Government, notably the Department of Commerce, now has authority to make long-term leases for rent of buildings. It is distinctly to the advantage of the Government to make this arrangement. In dealing with the owners of property which this department may desire to rent for office or laboratory purposes it will be possible, under the authority requested, to make more advantageous terms for the Government than under the present arrangement of yearly leases. As a specific instance, this department has received a proposal from a builder to erect for its use in this immediate neighborhood an office building on which a saving of $2,500 per annum in the rental can be made if the department is authorized to enter into a long-term lease. The department is now occupying buildings in this neighborhood which it has rented for many years, in some cases as many as 20 years. If it had had authority to make long-term leases, there is no question but that large savings could have been effected in the amounts paid for rent.

Mr. SMOOT. I say again to the Senate that I have deprived the Secretary of Agriculture of nothing. The proper course for the Secretary of Agriculture to adopt is to call the matter to the attention of the committee that has the subject matter in hand. If he can show that there is to be a saving of $2,500 a year upon this building, or any other building, the Committee on Appropriations will be glad to save that amount of money.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if he claims that an appropriation to hire, for instance, a single building in the city of Washington is general legislation?

I think we are carrying this matter of general legislation, in our objections to appropriation bills, to a ridiculous extent. If the Senator will turn to the precedents themselves, where Bouvier and the dictionary are cited to determine what is general and what is special legislation, we will find that this does not come under the definition of general legislation, which applies generally to a class or generally over the entire country and not to a particular locality or to a particular class.

While I do not know that it makes any difference, and I took no occasion to make any suggestion about it, I insist that a provision in an appropriation bill for renting a building in a certain locality is not general legislation under the terms of our rules.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is "buildings," not "a building."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the question of order, but I think my distinguished friend was mistaken in what he said about appropriating money in another committee for the rent of buildings. We do provide for all the rents of the buildings in the city of Washington, I think, except the Department of Agriculture. I have no recollection of ever making provision for the rent of a building for the Agricultural Department.

I will ask the Senator from Wyoming, who is much older in service on the committee than I am, whether we have ever carried an appropriation for rent for the Agricultural Department. I think the Senator is mistaken. If so, I think the matter ought to be reconsidered. I should like to know the experience of the Senator from Wyoming, as to whether his recollection is in accord with mine or not.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not relish getting into a controversy of this kind. I am of the opinion that the Agricultural appropriation bill rests solely upon the law which created the Department of Agriculture, and in that respect we do not even provide in other bills for the Secretary's salary, or anything of the sort. It is all in the Agricultural bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I do not like the amendment in the shape it is in, but I believe the stricture that it ought to be in another bill does not rest upon the fact that it has been that way heretofore.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is my recollection. I remember that this is one department with which we have nothing in the world to do, whereas in the case of every other department we do provide for rent of buildings. The Agricultural Department being provided for by statute, we have not provided for rents in connection with it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee says that if this provision is allowed to remain in the bill the Secretary of Agriculture can save for the Government $2,500 per year. The appropriation for rent is, therefore, in some other appropriation bill. This provision says:

That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever in his judgment it is clearly advantageous to the Government, may lease for terms not exceeding 10 years buildings or parts of buildings in the District of Columbia necessary for the accommodation of the Department of Agriculture.

There is no appropriation whatever connected with this.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator is both right and wrong in this respect: He is right in that there is no specific place where authority is granted for rental of new buildings; but there are through the bill several appropriations that include the appointment of men and rental of buildings in Washington in the appropriations themselves.

Mr. SMOOT. But they specifically state what they are. This refers to an appropriation that is made for rent of a certain building in this District.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or buildings.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; or buildings. It says "buildings or parts of buildings."

Mr. GALLINGER. You could rent a hundred buildings under that language. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 73, beginning in line 17, the committee proposed to insert the following:

For investigating the grading, weighing, and handling of naval stores, and the establishment and preparation of definite type samples thereof, $5,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I make the same point of order against this item.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this amendment is not general legislation in any sense. The Agricultural Department has charge of the Forestry Service. It has charge of all agricultural work. These are products of the forest, and they are just in the line of all the other work that has been done by the Agricultural Department. It is a single appropriation. It dies with its one service. There will never be another service to be had on the subject. What is intended is simply this: The turpentine and rosin interests of our entire country, stretching from the Atlantic to beyond the Mississippi, have found difficulty about established standards, and they simply desire that the Agricultural Department shall examine and standardize the product, and the work is over with.

Mr. GALLINGER. I notice the Senator said the Agricultural Department have jurisdiction over forests. They are not tapping the trees in the national forests to get turpentine?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but the trees fall under the work of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. But this seems to deal with turpentine that comes from the tree.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the product of the tree.

Mr. OVERMAN. This appropriation is for standardization?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Ought it not to be under the Bureau of Standards?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so. The standardization of cotton is under the Agricultural Department. This is the class of standardization that falls under the work of the Agricultural Department. The request for this standardization came from the general organization of naval-stores people including turpentine, rosin, and all naval stores of that kind. It is an enormous industry. It is one of the largest exports that we have. At their convention they appointed a committee to appear before the Committee on Agriculture and ask that a small appropriation, as the work will be small, be made that their products may be sold in the commercial world on established grades. It was their view that it would facilitate their commercial relations abroad in the sale of their products. As I said, the appropriation dies with this one appropriation, for when it is once done it is over; it is no continuing appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Georgia that this is not a new subject before the Senate. Former Senator Taliaferro presented an item like this quite often, and really I thought it was simply to continue that which had already been done in the past.

Mr. GALLINGER. He debated it for hours.

Mr. SMOOT. He debated for hours at a time the standardization of naval stores, which included turpentine, and that is the particular article in which he was specially interested. I can not see but that this is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. WEST. I do not think this is the same item that former Senator Taliaferro was interested in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is very different.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No. I suppose the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] has more knowledge of the turpentine and rosin business than probably all the balance of the Senate put together, and I have no doubt he is familiar with that legislation. I understand this is an entirely different proposition from that Senator Taliaferro brought before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I still make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that I have traveled sufficiently through the South to observe those vaccinated trees that are scattered over three or four States, and for the life of me I could not see why the Government should go into the work of increasing the value of the product for that particular interest. It looks to me like a subsidy, and that alarms me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I am sure the Senator will give it his support. I am much obliged to the Senator for his assistance.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will let the matter rest on the decision of the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in reference to the point of order, this is not general legislation. Every Agricultural appropriation bill assigns and modifies the work of the Agricultural Department on certain specific lines. As the bill comes from the House and work develops an appropriation is made for this line of work and that line of work in the Agriculture Department. It changes no law. It is simply a designation of a particular piece of work in the line of their ordinary work. It is simply an appropriation, and their authority to do the work comes under the general law. This is nothing but an appropriation. It does not require any work outside of their ordinary line of work. It does not change or modify existing laws. It simply says to the department, "Here is a fund with which you can do work that already belongs to you under the broad sphere of the act creating your department"; but an appropriation was necessary to do it. If each time an appropriation is placed in any one of these bills for the Agriculture Department to do a piece of work that it had not done before that is held to be general legislation, most of the bill would fail.

The Committee on Agriculture, in charge of the appropriation bill, studies the field of the Agriculture Department's work, and it designates funds for particular lines of work that fall within the purview of the Agriculture Department's general work.

If each item of work which the Agricultural Department is allowed to do through a particular appropriation constitutes general legislation, you could not make an appropriation.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I will state the rule, which makes it clear that the amendment is in order. Rule XVI provides that to add a new item of appropriation—and this is a new item of appropriation—there shall be certain conditions—first, that an estimate shall be made for it, and, second, that it shall be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate. This is moved by a standing committee of the Senate. This is a new item in an appropriation bill, put in by a standing committee of the Senate, and, under Rule XVI, it seems to me to be clearly in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thank the Senator from Virginia. A new item of appropriation must come either from an estimate of the department or from the committee. Do you mean to say that the Agricultural Department, seeing a line of work which it ought to do and asking for an appropriation to do that particular work, can not obtain the appropriation on the Agricultural appropriation bill without passing a special statute to enable the department to do it?

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia will not lose sight of the fact that there is a clause in that rule—that troublesome rule—that general legislation can not go into an appropriation bill, even though it may contain an appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am distinguishing it from general legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If legislation were necessary to confer the power of conducting this class of work upon the Agricultural Department just as in the case immediately before, it would fall under the point of being new legislation. There is no legislation that authorizes the Agricultural Department to make a 10-year lease.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair inquire what really is the Agricultural Department of this Government authorized to do—everything?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Agricultural Department is, broadly, authorized to conduct lines of work to promote the interests of agriculture and of agricultural production.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me just a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. In my opinion this is general legislation, for the provision reads in this way:

For investigating the grading, weighing, and handling of naval stores, and the establishment and preparation of definite type samples thereof, $5,000.

If to establish those types is not legislation, I do not know what legislation is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, I will ask to amend the paragraph by striking out the words "and the establishment."

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. There is a point of order now before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, Mr. President, if one element of the point of order involves the words in the paragraph and we can amend by striking them out, I think we are entitled to have that amendment passed upon before the point of order is decided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. That will not obviate the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator should move to strike it all out except the appropriation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia is in order. It will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 73, line 18, in the amendment reported by the committee, it is proposed to strike out the words "and the establishment," so as to read:

For investigating the grading, weighing, and handling of naval stores, and preparation of definite type samples thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the point of order renewed?

Mr. SMOOT. Now, I renew the point of order, and I call particular attention to the fact that the word "preparation" is exactly the same as the word "establishment," so far as it being new legislation is concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It seems to the Chair that the Senate has discussed this point of order quite fully, and the Chair will submit the question to the Senate, it having been so discussed. Is the amendment in order?

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I desire to say in reference to the establishment and preparation of definite type samples in naval stores that it has long since been discovered that in getting these samples they are supposed to be seven-eighths of an inch. If they are a little larger or a little smaller than the standard, that fact influences the grade. There has been great trouble about that. The grade in the rosin does not keep itself long at a time. The purpose of this provision is that definite type samples be established. For instance, the best grade is water white; the next is window glass; and so on down. They would make them of a definite shape and size in order that they might stay the same always, for, as a matter of fact, the rosin itself changes; if you get it a little too large, it lowers the grade, or if it is too small, it raises the grade. Before I conclude, I would say that I can not see any difference in the establishment of these type samples and the establishment of grades of cotton and grades of grain.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the argument the Senator from Georgia has just made could not be made any stronger to prove that this is general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order having been discussed, the question is, Is the amendment in order? [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I call for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All who believe that the amendment is general legislation will rise——

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the question is perhaps not understood. It should not be put in the affirmative.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Is the amendment in order?

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 18; no quorum voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Hollis	Page	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	James	Perkins	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Johnson	Pittman	Smith, S. C.

Crawford	McCumber	Sheppard	Warren
Dillingham	McLean	Sherman	Weeks

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to announce the necessary absence on the business of the Senate of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is, Is the amendment in order? [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All those who believe the amendment to be in order will rise. [A pause.] All who believe the amendment not to be in order will rise. [A pause.] The amendment is declared to be in order. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. SMOOT. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] and withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair as on a former ballot, but transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], who is absent, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote "nay."

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when the name of Mr. THOMAS was called). I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

I am requested to announce also the absence from the Senate on the business of the Senate of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

While on my feet I wish also to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming] and his pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded, and the Secretary recapitulated the vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In order to make a quorum, I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay," nay being the safest vote when you do not know what the question is.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—29.

So the amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, a number of Senators desire to attend the exercises to-morrow afternoon in connection with the unveiling of the monument to Commodore Barry. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock; and I give notice, in this connection, that after the address to-morrow of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] I shall move that the Senate adjourn, to the end that Members of the Senate may attend those exercises.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment of the committee is on page 73, beginning on line 20.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that there is an amendment on page 18 which has been passed over heretofore, in which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is much interested. He desires to leave the city. I ask to have that amendment read. It has been thoroughly discussed, and probably will not provoke any additional discussion, if a dream of that sort may be indulged in.

The SECRETARY. Three amendments were passed over in the paragraph beginning on page 18, line 9, for investigating the ginning, handling, grading, baling, gin compressing, and wrapping of cotton, and the establishment and demonstration of standards for the different grades thereof.

The first amendment is in the proviso, beginning on line 13, where the committee proposes to strike out "$80,580" and to insert "$180,580: Provided, That of the sum thus appropriated $100,000 shall be used for furnishing the primary markets in the cotton-growing States with a set of the samples as standardized by the Government, and a sample of the bleached and unbleached yarns made from the different grades, showing the waste, tensile strength, and bleaching quality thereof."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I make the point of order on that amendment that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believes that it is substantially in accordance with other sections that have been passed upon by the Senate to-day. The Chair is not in accord with the Senate; the Chair believes that it is general legislation, but the Chair submits the question to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Chair submits it, I withdraw the point of order. When a point of order is as clear, to my mind, as this is, I do not propose to have it submitted to the Senate.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator ought to be perfectly willing to submit it. If it is that clear, the Senate will certainly take a wise view of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I make the point of order, then, if the Senator from New Hampshire does not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It seems identical with the former point of order that was raised, as the Chair sees it; and as the matter was decided this afternoon by the Senate, the Chair does not agree with the Senate; but the Chair submits the question to the Senate. The question is, Is the amendment in order?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to say that I took no exception to the action of the Chair. That is provided for in the rules; but the matter is so clear, to my mind, that I do not care to make the point of order and have it submitted. That is all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is nothing more nor less than providing how the appropriation shall be used.

Mr. SMOOT. The matter is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not care to go into the discussion of it, because it is a matter of such great importance, not only to my section of the country but to the whole textile industry, that I do not think anyone who has at heart the interest not only of the agricultural people but of the great export trade dependent upon this industry would for a moment vote against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Is the amendment in order? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair as on a former roll call and withhold my vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] and withhold my vote. While I am on my feet I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. He is absent. I transfer my pair with him to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am requested to announce the pair existing between the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 11, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 15, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, that the trend of life is ever toward the ideal in the home, society, government, religion, the promise of victory at last. For Thou, O God, art good, ever working in and through the hearts of Thy children. May it be ours to do and dare, to live and smile; pushing forward unperturbed by adverse winds and tides until at last victory shall be ours, under the divine leadership of the world's Great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15503. An act authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to the Republic of Chile.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 15503. An act authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to the Republic of Chile.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15762, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15762, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, with Mr. FINLEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15762) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I believe there are 32 minutes remaining on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-two minutes.

Mr. COOPER. And how much on the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has one minute remaining.

Mr. COOPER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

[Mr. JOHNSON of Washington addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentleman consume?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman consumed three minutes.

Mr. COOPER. I yield a half minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I propose to take advantage of that time to place in the RECORD a letter from the San Francisco Center of the California Civic League, protesting against the discrimination shown by the administration in refusing to appoint women.

The letter is as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO CENTER OF THE CALIFORNIA CIVIC LEAGUE,
San Francisco, May 9, 1914.

Hon. JOSEPH RUSSELL KNOWLAND,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The board of directors of the San Francisco Center of the California Civic League desires to call your attention to the following letter, which has been sent to President Wilson and to Attorney General McReynolds:

"In spite of denials it is generally understood in California that Mrs. Annette Adams was not appointed to the United States district attorney's office solely because she is a woman. The San Francisco Center of the California Civic League does not ask that inferior women be appointed to Federal positions, but it does demand that the names of women citizens be submitted to the same tests, and only to the same tests, as those of men; that is, character and fitness.

"The center protests against the rejection of Mrs. Adams, or any other woman, solely on sex grounds; women electors, who are otherwise qualified, having the same right to these positions as male electors. We realize that other grounds are alleged for Mrs. Adams's rejection, but we find from such investigation as we have been able to make that sex discrimination must have been the determining factor in her rejection at Washington."

Very respectfully, yours,

MARION DELANY,
Corresponding Secretary.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, admitting the necessity of more extended legislation on the part of Congress for the protection of the water-power interests of the United States and regulation of hydroelectric companies, and, moreover, recognizing the value of many of the provisions of the pending bill, I desire to call the attention of this House to two sections of this bill that appear fraught with serious consequences and may be used to defeat the very purpose of the proposed act, which I take to be the safeguarding of the water-power resources of this country.

How great these resources are is plain to all. The Commissioner of Corporations in his report to the President, submitted March 14, 1912, found 6,000,000 horsepower of hydroelectric plants in use as of June, 1911, measured by water-wheel installation then in operation. The commercially available water power of such companies and plants fully developed was estimated at 25,000,000 horsepower. The potential maximum of undeveloped sites listed by the Government, not including storage reservoirs, would swell this to over 60,000,000 horsepower.

Prominent hydroelectric authorities, such as Mr. Rome G. Brown, have estimated the total potential water-power development of the United States at 200,000,000 horsepower. If to this immense power total we apply the conservative valuation of $20 per horsepower, we find the potential water-power resources of this country run into hundreds of millions of dollars per annum. This gives us a bird's-eye view of the vast volume of wealth in the possession of the Nation and States of this Union, the control and regulation of which we are seeking to determine through this bill. With such vast issues involved and at stake, affecting the rights and interests of the people of this country, not only to-day but for a period of at least 50 years into the future, as shown by the 50-year term fixed in this bill for water-power franchises, we can not exercise too great care in scrutinizing the provisions which we incorporate into this measure.

IMMUNITY FROM PROVISIONS OF ANTITRUST LAWS.

The first provision to which I desire to call your attention is section 15, as follows:

SEC. 15. That no works constructed, maintained, and operated under the provisions of this act shall be owned, trusteed, or controlled by any device or in any manner so that they may form a part of, or in any manner effect, a combination in the form of an unlawful trust or form the subject of an unlawful contract or conspiracy to limit the output of electric energy, or the exercise of any other business contemplated: Provided, however—

And to this proviso I desire the close scrutiny of this House.

Provided, however, That it shall be lawful, under the approval of the Secretary of War, for different grantees to exchange and interchange currents; to assist one another whenever necessary, by supplementing the currents or power; and enable any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business and supply his customers, accounting therefor and paying therefor under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the bill the gentleman is discussing? He stated it by number, but not by title.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. It is an amendment of the general dam act—properly named. [Laughter.]

In order to appreciate the full force of this proviso it is necessary to read this section inversely; and thus reading it, what do we learn? That "for different grantees to exchange and interchange currents; to assist one another whenever necessary, by supplementing the currents or power; and enable any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business and supply his customers" is lawful. That is to say, reading in here the following language of the major propositions, it is not (1) "a combination in the form of an unlawful trust," or (2) "the subject of an unlawful contract or conspiracy to limit the output of electric energy, or in restraint of the generation, sale, or distribution of electric energy."

In brief, grantees of water-power rights at the hands of Congress may join in the exchange and interchange of business and cooperate and combine in the conduct of their business, and unite in securing assistance to carry on their business, and such united and cooperative action is not "a combination in the form of an unlawful trust," nor is it "in restraint of the generation, sale, or distribution of electric energy," and therefore such united action of water-power grantees is, to that extent, immune from the prohibitions and penalties of the national and State antitrust laws.

That, in substance, Mr. Chairman, is the logical and practical interpretation of this section. And now let us look for the application to the water-power companies and hydroelectric conditions of this country.

Let us note, first, what Herbert Knox Smith, former Commissioner of Corporations, says of the present trend of water-power organizations in his letter of March 14, 1912, submitting his report to the President.

Note these first two results, as ascertained by the department's investigations. The commissioner says:

This report shows the results:
(1) An increasing concentration of the control of water powers by certain large interests.
(2) Extensive relationship between water-power interests, public-service companies (street railway, lighting, and power concerns), and banks.

This trend had already been forecast in the veto messages transmitted to Congress by former President Theodore Roosevelt in his vetoes of the Rainy River and James River dam bills. Speaking of the alarming proportions of the concentration trend of water-power and public-service corporations, President Roosevelt summarized the situation in the following significant terms:

In other words, it is probable that these 13 concerns directly or indirectly control developed water power and advantageous power sites equal to more than 33 per cent of the total water power now in use. This astonishing consolidation has taken place practically within the last five years.

When a small group of 13 corporations, Mr. Chairman, control one-third of the total water power in use by a nation of 100,000,000 people, and, in addition to that, the lion's share of the advantageous power sites yet undeveloped, we begin to appreciate the significance of a provision which makes it lawful and beyond the limitations of our antitrust laws for such consolidations to enjoy the special privileges of free exchange and interchange of business and joint action in the conduct thereof and the financing thereof in carrying on their business.

The conditions described in the Roosevelt veto messages were those of six years ago. Let us now take a concrete case from the report of Commissioner Herbert Knox Smith of two years ago. Let us take his report upon that giant consolidation known as "The General Electric Group."

And right here I want to state to the members of this committee they can not secure a copy of this report without paying 75 cents for it. We have no trouble in procuring copies of reports that teach us how to distinguish the difference between the male and female angleworm, but when it comes to a great substantial proposition we find that the reports are not to be had unless purchased.

Here is one corporation, or rather aggregation of corporations under one general directorate, that controls 50 per cent of the commercial power of 18 States. It not only controls the water powers, but the principal public-service corporations which buy and consume the power. It controls the street railways of 16 cities and the electric-light plants of 78 cities. For fear the municipalities might evade its lighting monopoly and use gas, it stops that possible loophole by owning the gas plants of 19 cities.

By way of illustration of that provision of the section before us, which specifies that these water-power grantees may join "to secure assistance to carry on the business," we find that this General Electric group of officers and directors are likewise officers and directors in upward of 50 banks and trust companies, including 5 of the leading financial houses of Philadelphia, 6 in Boston, and 24 banks and trust companies in New York City, there being 3 General Electric directors in J. P. Morgan & Co., the leading underwriting corporation of America. And this bill makes such financial cooperation and combination lawful and immune from the operations of the Sherman antitrust law.

Gentlemen of the committee, you have all read the testimony of Charles S. Mellen given yesterday before the Interstate Commerce Commission. From the disclosures made by Mr. Mellen, indicating how these large financial institutions operate when they have an opportunity, do you not now realize more than ever before what it means to have an institution like J. P. Morgan & Co. given an opportunity to control the hydroelectric power plants of this country?

Says Commissioner Smith in his report to the President:

This one group of interrelationships—

Referring to the General Electric—controls or influences 24 corporations that operate hydroelectric plants; over 50 public-service corporations, not counting as many minor subsidiaries; and, finally, one group of interrelationships includes numerous railroads and industrial corporations and over 50 banks and financial houses, many of them in the first rank of importance. About 20 "General Electric" men in all constitute most of the chain of connection, 3 of these being members of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co.

As showing the sweeping character of the network of operations of this one company and the transcontinental breadth of its control, we find that it owns and controls 55 per cent of the water powers of Oregon and Washington, on the Pacific; 72 per cent of the water powers of Colorado, in the Rockies; 61 per cent of the water powers of New Hampshire, in New England; and 80 per cent of the hydroelectric plants of the State of Pennsylvania. But that is not all. Says the Commissioner of Corporations:

The influence of the General Electric Co. in municipal public-service corporations extends into practically every section of the United States.

In the face of such official statement of facts and conditions, Mr. Chairman, is the Congress of the United States, fully conversant with the tidal wave of trust organization which has besieged the Nation, now about to pronounce this interrelationship as above described lawful? Are we going to make this vast hydroelectric combination immune from the operations of the antitrust laws of the Nation and the States?

Are we going to write into the law of the land, for the government of an aggregation which includes 24 hydroelectric companies, 50 public-service corporations, not including subsidiaries, numerous railroads and industrial corporations, the street railways of 16 cities, the gas plants of 19 cities, the electric-light plants of 78 cities, and holds directorates in 50 leading banks and trust companies, the language of this bill, which says:

It shall be lawful, under the approval of the Secretary of War, for different grantees to exchange and interchange currents, to assist one another whenever necessary, by supplementing the currents or power, and enable any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business and supply his customers, accounting therefor and paying therefor under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War?

Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of War at this time has troubles on hand in connection with the pacification and the interrelationships of our neighboring Republic of Mexico. But before he, under the provisions of this bill, should get through one year of the accounts and payments and exchanges and interchanges and of first aid between grantees whenever they may see fit to deem necessary, and of rate regulations and adjustments for all the corporations and subsidiaries and interrelationships involved in this one great combination known as the General Electric, he would look upon the Mexican problem by comparison as an A B C lesson.

But the first and most serious question before this House is this: Are we going to cooperate with the hydroelectric and public-service combinations in their plain efforts to evade the operations of the antitrust law? Shall we go further and open and pave the road to such wholesale evasion? Shall we by law extend special trust immunity to all corporations and combinations and interrelationships which seek the monopoly of our great water-power resources and the control of our municipal utilities?

There is not a Member of this House who does not realize the nature and extent of the national struggle of the past 25 years to place upon our statutes and secure the efficient administration and strict judicial interpretation of a law for the protection of the people from trust aggrandizement. We know how such law has been fought at every step; we know how for years every foot of the path was blocked and the law was made a dead letter; and then how, little by little, the proper enforcement and interpretation of the law began to make progress in the interest of public welfare. We know how it was fought by the greatest industrial giants of the age and by the ablest of corporate counsel; and at last we have begun to get light and see our way through the trust jungle to something like law and order.

Mr. Chairman, in the history of the American Congress during the past half century I question if there is any one act which can be pointed to as a greater monument to the constructive labor of this body in protecting the people from the greatest economic danger of the age than that law—the product of many sessions and many minds—known as the Sherman antitrust law. It is still imperfect enough at best, because of the vast difficulties and complexities of law and custom, of business and human greed, to be met and overcome. No law in the history of the world has had more powerful, bitter, and resourceful enemies. Shall this Congress now lend a hand to cooperate with these enemies and be a party to halt the progress of a half century of legislative and legal struggle? I can not believe it.

NEW 50-YEAR FRANCHISE TO WATER-POWER CORPORATIONS.

Mr. Chairman, I now desire to call the attention of the House to the second menace embodied in the provisions of this bill, and the section I now refer to is of no less value to the water-power grantees and their corporate interrelationships than the section above considered. I call your attention to the closing section, also a brand-new provision not found in the law of 1910, which it is proposed to amend:

SEC. 17. That all provisions in this act contained fixing conditions upon which the consent of Congress is granted for the construction of dams shall apply alike to all existing enterprises in operation or authorized as well as to new projects to which the consent of Congress may hereafter be granted. All conflicting provisions contained in any act of Congress granting consent to the construction of any dam are hereby repealed, and all such previous authorizations are so altered, amended, and modified hereby as to conform to all the conditions and provisions incorporated in this act.

What is the force of this provision, Mr. Chairman? It is to give to every water-power grantee of the United States, now in operation or hitherto authorized, a brand-new franchise from the date of the approval of this act, and modified to the conditions and provisions incorporated in this act.

What will be the provisions of these new water-power grants, dating from the passage of this bill?

First, the term of the grants. Sections 9 and 10 provide that the rights herein granted shall continue for a period of 50 years from and after the date of the completion of the structure described in the approval of the Secretary of War, and thereafter until the grantee, in the event of the taking over of the property by the United States, has been fully compensated for the value of the property.

This means a new 50-year franchise for all the water-power grantees of the Government. It does not matter how defective was the original grant or how limited; all defects and shortcomings are cured and copper-bottomed and extended for a half century to come or until most of the living beneficiaries are dead and buried.

Second, in regard to the powers of the grant. All the new immunities granted in section 15 above, authorizing different grantees to exchange and interchange currents, to assist one another whenever necessary by supplementing the currents or power, and enabling any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business and supply his customers, are incorporated in the new franchises and hold good for the coming 50 years. So that if the old grants were given by Congress subject to the provisions of antitrust laws, all such limitations are removed and full immunities granted for interchange of business and cooperative physical and financial aid between the interrelated grantees and their subsidiaries.

The phrase "enable any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business and supply his customers" has special significance in aid of such an aggregation as the General Electric, because among the chief of its customers are the public-service corporations, including street railway and lighting companies, which consume electric current and at the same time belong to the great corporate interrelationship. The relationship, the mutual assistance, and the supply of such "customers," as well as the financing under the name of securing "assistance to carry on the business," are all made lawful and incorporated in the new charters.

Behold, then, the General Electric, the Westinghouse, the Stone & Webster, and other great corporate groups enumerated by the Commissioner of Corporations, starting out with their new 50-year franchises and grants of immunities. It is quite proper in this connection that the bill should define "persons" as covering "both the singular and the plural, as the case demands, and shall include corporations, companies, and associations"; and also, it might have added, the "groups" and "interrelationships" described by the Commissioner of Corporations.

It is proper that the bill should provide, in the last clause of section 17, that "in no case shall such arrangement be permitted to raise the price." That, however, would appear to be superfluous, in view of the fact that rates can scarcely be forced upward in the face of a future largely increased development and use of electric current and public utilities. It is notable, however, that there is nothing in the bill prohibiting such aggregations from resisting the natural reduction in rates which largely increased volume of consumption should bring about or defeating price cuts which might be threatened by possible competition. They are simply not allowed to "raise the price." They may sustain present prices through the term of the grants.

EXEMPTION FROM STATE CONTROL.

One of the serious and widespread consequences of sections 15 and 17 is the logical exemption of the principal hydroelectric corporations of the United States from State regulation and control and the substitution of the fiat of the Secretary of War for the laws, constitutions, and public-service regulations of the several States in which the hydroelectric plants and allied public-utility companies are located.

Section 11 provides that where the electric current enters interstate commerce the Secretary of War is—hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what shall be the just and reasonable rates and charges therefor to be observed as the maximum to be charged and the service to be rendered.

This authority would not be so far-reaching were it not for the provision in section 15 permitting "different grantees to exchange and interchange currents." When you give that power to an aggregation of allied hydroelectric corporations, such as the General Electric or the Stone & Webster, and like groups, which may extend their operations over a stretch of adjoining States in a period in which, as stated by the Commissioner of Corporations, such electric group may operate over a contiguous area of 100,000 square miles, no one can effectually dispute their claim that their current is interstate, and thereby, under the provisions of sections 11 and 15, subject only to the regulation of the Secretary of War.

Such a condition would render null and void all attempts of States and municipalities under present laws and charters to regulate such electric utilities. The public-service commissions of 30 or more States which attempt to regulate such utilities would be put out of commission and their powers bestowed in lump upon the Secretary of War, who by nature of his location can know little of local conditions and be in only a slight degree in touch with the great masses of local, State, and municipal consumers. They can not go to him in Washington to attend hearings and make statement of grievances, as now provided for in State and municipal laws and ordinances. And, in the nature of things, the Secretary of War can not visit the people of the 48 States and their thousands of municipalities and settle their just grievances.

The practical working of this provision will be that in any State or city where there is an efficient local commission which looks after the local public interest and holds the public-service corporation strictly to account, and not to its liking, the corporation that does not like such local regulation under the eyes of consumers will set up the excuse given by section 11 and claim that its current is interstate, because its plant is "tied in" or "coupled up" with other plants across the State boundary, as authorized by "the exchange and interchange of current" clause of this bill.

My own State operates under the home-rule plan. The State has legal machinery by which the people regulate and control their public-service corporations, but this bill makes it possible for the companies to evade and escape such State and local control. If the power at the high dam at Minneapolis were owned by a public-service corporation, and if it were tied in with the hydroelectric dam at St. Croix Falls, the current would then become interstate, and the Secretary of War would have the right to fix prices as well as regulate the service for the people of Duluth, St. Paul, and Minneapolis.

In my neighboring State of Wisconsin they have a new law for the regulation of all hydroelectric companies, as well as public utilities generally, by State commission. The Wisconsin water-power law is elaborate and detailed and covers every branch of procedure, giving all aggrieved parties and consumers full hearings for adjustment of claims and complaints as to rates and quality of service.

Eighteen States of the Union cover waterway and water-power control in their constitutions. But what are these constitutional provisions worth if the great hydroelectric aggregations are given by Congress an easy route of evasion from State jurisdiction to that of the Secretary of War?

What is the result? Instead of government of the water powers and public utilities of a State by the people of that State you substitute government by the Secretary of War. Is that democracy? Is that in accord with the teachings of Jefferson and Lincoln? Is that what our fathers fought for and what they incorporated into the great Declaration and Bill of Rights of our Constitution?

When electric current enters a State it should be subject to regulation by the laws of that State without interference on the part of the Federal Government. It is the duty of the representatives of the people, as well as of the people themselves, to resist any effort which, if successful, will deprive the State of exercising power and control over matters of local concern. Those functions of government which are national in character belong to the Federal Government, and those that are local belong to the several States. For 125 years we have adhered to this basic principle, and in the light of the success which has come to us I for one am not willing to abandon it.

CORPORATE FEAR OF THE STATE.

If any Member is in doubt as to what is intended to be accomplished by section 11, I invite his attention for a moment to the hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on April 14, 1914, pages 26 and 27:

MR. HUGH L. COOPER, CONSULTING ENGINEER AND OWNER OF WATER-POWER PROJECTS, ON THE STAND.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the reason this will not do? If it is entirely within the jurisdiction of the State, let the State do what it pleases.

Mr. COOPER. I am afraid of any State.

I have heard such awful things stated in the halls of various legislatures that I am generally afraid of them. It is no joke with me; I am afraid of them, but I am not afraid of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose that we provide that if the State does not provide adequate legislation, that the Government preserve the right to do it, and they can not confiscate your property by making the rate too low.

Mr. COOPER. That is all I ask.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we are about of the opinion to do that.

Mr. Cooper can not be familiar with the history of Minnesota. By practically a unanimous vote the citizens of that State directed the State treasurer to pay a $5,000,000 bond issue after the supreme court of the State and of the United States held the issue void.

Since regulation has become the established mode of dealing with public utilities, their owners have been endeavoring to place them in the hands of an individual or board as far removed from the consumer as possible. Does anyone know any other place where power could be lodged that would be further removed from the people than in the War Department?

SECRETARY MAY PERMIT STATE REGULATION.

But our attention is called, Mr. Chairman, to that beneficent provision of this bill wherein the Secretary of War may grant to the States, if thus he may be so generous minded and fully satisfied that it is wise so to do, the boon of regulating by their own laws the rates, charges, and service to the consumers for such electric current.

The special proviso to such end reads as follows:

Provided, That whenever the State in which such current shall be used shall have provided by law adequate regulation for rates, charges, and service to the consumers for such electric current, and such regulation shall not be unduly discriminatory or unjust against the service or charges in any other State arising from the use of the power from the same project, and such facts shall be established to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, then in such case the provisions of this section shall not apply to the rates, charges, and service in and for such State.

This is certainly one of the most original and unique, as well as generous and beneficent, provisions ever proposed in a bill submitted for passage by the Congress of the United States. Upward of 30 States thus far have laws for the regulation of electric rates and service, and a great many hundred municipalities have charters and ordinances of like purpose. The Secretary of War, endowed with the kindly authority of a father, will take note of such efforts on the part of the States. If he finds a State in which such attempted regulation appears to him to be "adequate," he may waive the supreme authority conferred upon him by this bill and allow the State to undertake his function of regulating its own rates and service. But he must first satisfy himself that such State "regulation shall not be unduly discriminatory and unjust," and of that he is the responsible arbiter and supreme judge.

Eighteen States have constitutional provisions asserting State sovereignty over State water resources. Colorado and New Mexico declare in their constitutions that the waters of the State are public property belonging to the people. North Dakota and Wyoming declare their waters the property of the State. Colorado and Idaho give preference to the domestic use of water over navigation and to irrigation for agriculture over water power for manufactures. California and Idaho declare that their waters may be appropriated for beneficial uses, subject to the control of the State. Colorado and Idaho authorize in their constitutions legislative regulation of water rates and service. Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Oklahoma, Washington, and Wyoming assert in their organic acts the right of eminent domain for the construction of reservoirs, canals, and dams. Recent statutes of Minnesota and Wisconsin, like the laws of the great majority of Western States, declare the waters of the State to be public property dedicated to the use of the people and subject to the regulation and control of the State.

The honorable Secretary of War will consider, under the authority of the above happy proviso in the bill, all such State constitutions and laws; and if, peradventure, he finds such State constitutions and laws wise, "adequate," and not "unduly discriminatory and unjust," or, to quote the careful and exact language of the bill, "and such facts shall be established to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War," then, "in such case the provisions of this section shall not apply to the rates, charges, and service in such State."

Mr. Chairman, thus did Moses, in certain cases, grant to the children of Israel the privilege of making rules for their own government. Thus did Lord North concede, in many cases, the wisdom of colonial legislation. So, likewise, did George III ratify as sane and permissible many of the measures adopted by the American Colonies. And through the course of human history, from the time of Moses down to that of King George III, excepting only such revolutionary periods as those of Magna Charta, Oliver Cromwell, and George Washington, it was always the custom to place over the people and their attempts at local government some wise lawgiver, who reviewed their sundry rules and ordinances and ratified and incorporated into the law of the land those provisions which he deemed wise and "adequate."

It is only since 1776 that the experiment has been tried of allowing the people themselves to be judge of the adequacy and justice of the laws of their making, and the consequences are apparent in many poor laws. It is fortunate, indeed, for the people of the United States at this juncture, when the entire water resources of the 48 States and the Nation at large are at stake, the potential income of which may reach hundreds of millions of dollars per annum for generations to come, as long as the rains of heaven shall condescend to fall upon the earth. It is fortunate, I say, that we have in this Nation one man, though an appointive Secretary at that, who is eminently and signally competent not only to regulate the hydroelectric lightnings in their countless public-service ramifications throughout the length and breadth of the greatest empire on earth, but likewise to review the constitutions, laws, charters, and contract regulations of this constellation of States and the myriad municipal subdivisions thereof, and sift, analyze, select, and determine that which is nondiscriminatory, adequate, just, safe, and sane, thereby giving to such regulations the force of law and casting all else into outer darkness. And it occurs to me as highly appropriate, Mr. Chairman, that the trustees of the Carnegie and Rockefeller Foundations should erect a monument to the genius who has made the discovery of this man. Moreover, were the three General Electric directors of J. P. Morgan & Co. (Ltd.) within reach of my voice I have no doubt they would second my suggestion.

SOVEREIGNTY OVER STATE WATERS.

Unfortunately for the theory of government upon which this beneficent but paternalistic provision is based, the Supreme Court of the United States has given to the world the following doctrine pertaining to the sovereign rights of the States over their waters:

Each individual State of the Union has control of the waters of navigable streams and lakes within its borders, the right and interest of the United States in such waters being only that their navigability be preserved for interstate commerce. The title is in each State, and the use of the water is a matter of State regulation. (Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How., 212; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 1.)

The control of the General Government in the case of dams across navigable streams arises only as incidental to its control of interstate commerce and navigation. The sovereignty of the State over its waters is otherwise complete. Thus the laws and constitutions of the various States for the regulation of State water resources has solid foundation in the law of the land as interpreted by the court of last resort—said court of last resort being the Supreme Court of the United States, and not the Secretary of War, as proposed in this bill.

Condemnation for public use finds general recognition in two principal classes of cases: First, the domestic use of municipalities; and, second, the navigation purposes of either State or Nation. To this, under the constitutions of west-of-the-Mississippi States, is now being added storage reservoirs for irrigation and flood prevention.

COOPERATION OF NATION, STATE, AND MUNICIPALITY.

Thus the law of the land as it has been developed through the years offers a broad foundation of principle on which to frame a comprehensive water-regulation law, recognizing alike the rights and interests of Nation, State, and municipality on an equitable democratic basis of public cooperation. Such act should recognize Federal control only as interstate commerce and navigation is concerned, and rights incidental thereto. Municipal control should have its proper place based on domestic and public municipal requirements. All other control and regulation should rest on the sovereign authority of the State. Laws of the State for such water power and electric regulation should find their authority in such program, not on the ipse dixit of the Secretary of War, but on the recognized sovereignty of the State, which existed before the formation of the General Government, and on the original title of the people of the State to the waters which are part of the permanent State domain and inalienable. That the constitution and law of a sovereign State should derive their authority from the will of a single outside official is something which in this age of the world will scarcely find lodgment even in the law of a monarchy, to say nothing of a Republic like the United States, which is supposed to stand as the model of progressive democracy for the civilization of the twentieth century.

PUBLIC COOPERATION IN MINNESOTA.

Opportunity for such cooperation of Nation, State, and municipality exists in my own State and congressional district in connection with the use and operation of hydroelectric power at the so-called high dam across the Mississippi midway between the cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul. This 15,000-horsepower project of the General Government will be completed this season and be ready for hydroelectric installation next spring. The institutions of the State, the Twin Cities, and the Federal Government, located within a 6-mile radius of this plant, could readily consume the entire electric product. To that end the State Legislature of Minnesota has created a special public corporation with the mayors of Minneapolis and St. Paul and the president of the State university board of regents as directors. The State and the two cities are ready to issue bonds for the construction of the necessary hydroelectric plant for the generation and distribution of electric current and provide for the scientific and business administration of such enterprise, and they also stand ready to pay the General Government a proper rental, based on the interest on the Government investment. Now steps in a Chicago private corporation, which already has a practical monopoly of electric current supply and Government water-power grants in six to eight Minnesota and Wisconsin congressional districts, and there seems to be a strong disposition in certain quarters to exclude the public association and turn over the hydroelectric installation to the private foreign corporation. The argument for such private control is that the State and cities can just as well buy electric light and power from the private corporation and save the State and cities from a lot of experiment and trouble.

But this means that both the State and cities will have to pay extra rates in order to yield the middleman—the Chicago private corporation—profits and dividends for the product of a public project. What is the justification for bringing the private corporation into this public project? An argument is set up in favor of the greater economy of private operation by reason of the fact that the new Government water power may be "tied in" or "coupled up" with the 8 or 10 other hydroelectric plants owned and operated by the private corporation located on Mississippi River tributaries in Minnesota and Wisconsin, and that this consolidation permits of greater operating economy. Admitting this point for the sake of argument, is there not, on the other hand, a large element of extra cost involved—in the dividends which must be earned and the higher interest that must be paid on the stocks and bonds of the private corporation? Developed and operated as a public enterprise only, the rates and rental collected need only equal operating and fixed charges on the actual Government, State, and municipal investment, and the interest charge will approximate about 4 per cent. The private corporation must earn not only 5 to 6 per cent on its mortgage bonds, but enough profits additional to pay 6 to 10 per cent dividends on the capital stock of the shareholders who finance the enterprise for the profits it will make for them. Thus a group of middlemen seeking private profits are allowed to step in between the General Government on the one hand and the State and municipalities on the other and demand that public use shall yield its tribute to private profit.

PUBLIC USE PARAMOUNT TO PRIVATE PROFIT.

I hold, Mr. Chairman, that in the rental of all water-power resources by the United States in connection with dams and reservoirs erected for navigation and flood prevention, priority and preference should be given to public use over private profits, and that the State in which the water power is located should receive priority of consideration as a Government lessee.

Moreover, on the assumption that the water resources of a State exist and should be developed for the greatest public benefit of that State, rather than for exploitation by private capital, I hold that the purpose of Congress should be to cooperate with State and municipal government in the greatest degree and to give the local consuming public the largest practicable voice in the management of the water-power plants, that the service supplied and the rates charged may approximate the maximum efficiency and economy and most closely reach the needs and demands of the local consuming public. The aim of this bill, therefore, should be as democratic as practicable, with the minimum of Federal control commensurate with the protection of natural resources and interstate commerce.

PROVISION FOR ORDER OF PRIORITY OF RIGHT.

Furthermore, this bill should contain a well-considered provision defining the order of priority in regard to the use of the streams and water powers. The great electric trust groups naturally want no such order of priority. They want private greed placed on the same terms as public need, knowing full well that on such basis their powerful aggregations of capital and expert legal staffs and political machines can handle the situation and secure the cream of the water-power rights of the country.

But the United States Government, Mr. Chairman, has already established a proper precedent in determining the order of precedence in the disposition of water privileges in the international boundary water treaty between the United States and Canada. Article 8 of that treaty instructs the International Joint Commission that in adjusting disputed water claims it shall be guided by certain "rules or principles" for the determination of the order of precedence, which shall be as follows:

1. Use for domestic or sanitary purposes.
2. Uses for navigation, including service of canals for purposes of navigation.
3. Uses for power and irrigation purposes.

This principle of priority of public use is recognized in the modern water acts of all civilized nations. One of the latest acts of the kind is the new act of British Columbia, the most western of the Canadian Provinces. Part 4 of the British Columbia water act lays down the following rule of priority in the issue of leases:

PRIORITY PROVISION OF CANADA.

Part 4. Priority of purpose and of right in acquisition of water.—All licenses to use water shall issue with regard to the purpose for which it is required, which shall have priority in the following order:

First. Domestic purposes.

Second. Municipal purposes, which shall mean and include the supply of water by any company to a city, town, village, or unincorporated locality for domestic purposes.

Third. Irrigation of land for agricultural or horticultural purposes.

Fourth. Industrial purposes, which shall mean and include water required for the production of steam and all other purposes save domestic, municipal, irrigation, and the production of power for sale, barter, or exchange, and mining.

Fifth. Power, which shall mean and include the use of water for generating power for sale, barter, or exchange.

It will be noted that the new British law places commercial power last in the list of priority in the rental of water leases. The obvious basis for working out the above order of precedents is the degree of public use with which each purpose is affected. Profit from commercial power for sale and barter is properly deemed least affected with public use.

Navigation is not included in the provincial water act, because navigation comes under the control of the general Dominion Government, just as in our case it comes under the control of Congress for the protection of interstate commerce. It will be noted, however, that the Dominion Government turns over to the respective Provinces regulation of water resources for all purposes except navigation and interprovincial commerce, which is in accord with the principle laid down by the United States Supreme Court in Third Howard, page 212, and One hundred and fifty-second United States, page 1, quoted above. This, likewise, is in accord with best European practice, which rests upon joint cooperation of national, State, and municipal agencies in bringing the regulation of public service and public resources close to the consuming public.

NATIONAL COMMISSION OF CONSERVATION.

The pending bill goes far beyond the precedent of the acts of 1910 and 1906 in extending the powers of the Secretary of War as sole national arbiter in water-power regulation. It gives him the rate-making power, which is a legislative function. It likewise gives him the right of regulating service and issuing permits. Meantime, it leaves out the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, and the Interior, all of which deal more directly with the public domain and with the people and enterprises which use and develop the resources of our national domain. The Dominion of Canada works on a far more representative basis. Besides the water commissioners of the several Provinces, Canada has created as a general bureau of supervision and information a commission of conservation, which exercises such general Dominion control as is beyond the proper jurisdiction of the respective Provinces. This includes, as in our case, control of navigation and rights developed incident thereto. The Dominion of Canada does not rob the Provinces of their local regulation.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that our General Government would gain in general efficiency of administration of its public domain, including the regulation of its waterways and water powers, and the uses thereof for agriculture, commerce, navigation, flood protection, and forestry, if into such administration we brought the particular departments which directly deal with such public resources and their use and development by the people. The Secretary of War should be included, simply by reason of the fact that it is the Chief of Engineers upon whom the Government relies for engineering services in planning and constructing Government works. Aside from that essential service, the Department of War is, by nature of its purpose and organization, the least of all our Government departments in touch with the development of our industrial interior, which is essentially a program of peace rather than of war. Thus organized we would have a national commission of conservation, including the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Interior, and War, which, together, would bring all the administrative energies of our General Government dealing with the resources of our public domain into cooperation with the States and municipalities where these natural resources are located, for the mutual public service of all the people and the conservation of our vast resources of natural wealth for the highest good of the Nation and the several component States to-day, and for the generations to follow.

PUBLIC INTEREST OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. Chairman, few if any States of this Union are more directly and vitally concerned in the adoption of a sound and progressive national policy in the administration of water-power resources than my own State of Minnesota, and few congressional districts are more deeply interested than my own district, the city of Minneapolis. In the list of congressional grants of water-power rights listed in the final report of the National Waterways Commission, including all such grants by Congress from the year 1789 down to 1912, I find that 22, or approximately one-fifth of the total number of Federal grants, relate to dam and power sites within the State of Minnesota or on the boundary waters of that State. Certainly no State in the Union, therefore, has greater concern in the proper conservation and regulation of water-power resources.

In six congressional districts of Minnesota, and particularly in my own district, we have an additional direct interest, because a foreign corporation, controlled by Chicago capital, and operating in the four States of Illinois, Wisconsin, North Dakota, and Minnesota, has control of a large group of power plants, and likewise of public-service corporations furnishing light, heat, power, industrial, and transportation service, and has a practically complete monopoly of the sale and supply of hydroelectric current. With this corporation the city of Minneapolis has been engaged in legal contest for some time in the struggle to secure reasonable municipal lighting rates, and the aroused public sentiment of the State is such that there is little question that the incoming State legislature, which convenes in January, will give the people sufficient authority to adjust their grievances.

Let us now apply the provisions of the pending bill to the Minnesota situation and see why it may be fraught with danger. Here is a Chicago corporation which travels under the various names of H. M. Byllesby & Co., Northern States Power Co., Consumers' Power Co. of Chicago, and Minneapolis General Electric. Its headquarters and general offices are in Chicago, although its hydroelectric and public-utility plants are in four States. It owns and controls dam and power sites on the Apple and St. Croix Rivers in Wisconsin and on the Mississippi, Minnesota, Cannon, and other rivers in Minnesota. It also owns subsidiary steam plants at Minneapolis, St. Paul, Stillwater, Faribault, and other Minnesota cities. It likewise is supposed to have secured control of the lion's share of the undeveloped power sites granted by Congress on the Mississippi River in our State.

Section 15 of this bill would authorize this Chicago "interrelationship," to use the phrase of the Bureau of Corporations, to "tie in" or "couple up" all of these power plants into one cooperative entity. It makes it lawful for the "different grantees to exchange and interchange currents, to assist one another whenever necessary," and so forth. As a consequence, the electric current generated and distributed over the lines of the general operating company of this complex syndicate might be called by the company "local current," "intrastate current," or "interstate," to suit its interests best in any controversy which might arise, and no one except the company itself would know whether a given current which had been supplied was local, State, or interstate. If the State or municipality started a case, the company could say that the current was interstate; and, if the Secretary of War started regulation, the company could safely claim that the electric current in such case was State or local in its origin and beyond Federal control, which covered only interstate business. Thus the company could play city against State, State against Nation, and Nation against both State and city, and the people would get chaos, litigation, costs, and high rates, with the Chicago syndicate sitting serenely on the lid and laughing at the amateur performances of lawmakers in general and of this Congress in particular.

I am willing and anxious, Mr. Chairman, to cooperate with any well-considered effort to secure strict and efficient administration of our water-power resources, and when the proper time comes I shall offer amendments which I hope may help to cure the defects to which I have pointed in this bill, and properly amended I trust the bill may become a law. But the foundation of such effective law, I am convinced, will be such cooperation of Nation, State, and municipality that the highest permanent interests of each shall be conserved, and the people whose title and interests are directly concerned shall be given no uncertain voice in the conservation program.

How thoroughly imbued with the principle and practice of conservation are the people of Minnesota is shown by the report of the State treasurer, just issued. So wisely have the school, agricultural college, swamp land, and other land grants of Congress been conserved and administered by the people of Minnesota, Mr. Chairman, that the State treasurer reports to-day a net permanent trust fund to the credit of our educational institutions to the amount of over $30,000,000, while the public school and university estate, in the shape of iron mines, timber reserves, water powers, and farm lands, saved from congressional grants and preserved and administered for the school children of future generations of Minnesota is estimated at the ultimate total valuation of $200,000,000, which is perhaps the greatest public-school endowment in the world. So, I trust, fellow Members, that whatever legislation is attempted for the regulation of our public domain that no hasty act shall pass this House which in any manner can be used to jeopardize the safe and progressive administration and control of the State of Minnesota over the great resources of its public domain.

Mr. COOPER. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, on the 12th of last March I took part on this floor in what I supposed were the preliminaries of a campaign of real accomplishment for the people of this country. The story of the marvelous power of radium had startled the world, as cure of cancer was added as one of its inestimable properties. The price of this most precious of all precious metals soared to the unthinkable sum of $4,000,000 an ounce, or more than $1,000,000,000 for 16 pounds of 16 ounces each. Asia, South America, and Africa had been explored without encouragement of finding deposits of pitchblendes or carnotite or other ores containing radium. In Bohemia and Saxony and Russia private interests had gained control of these deposits. In Cornwall and the Trenwith mine, near St. Ives, the British Radium Corporation (Ltd.) held sway. The Cornish mine of South Terras, near Grampound Road, unique in that it had been worked in the past solely for uranium ore, was owned by the Société Industrielle de Radium.

The Canadian Government on that same 12th of March had declared, among other things—

AT THE GOVERNMENT HOUSE AT OTTAWA,
Thursday, the 12th day of March, 1914.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE GOVERNOR GENERAL IN COUNCIL:

* * * * * * *

And whereas it would appear to be to the public interest that radium, which means and includes all deposits of carnotite, pitchblendes, or other ores containing radium in sufficient quantity for commercial extraction, the property of the Crown, should be for the present withdrawn from disposal:

Therefore His Royal Highness the Governor General in Council, under and by virtue of the provisions of section 37 of the act 7–8 Edward VII, chapter 20, is pleased to authorize the minister of the interior to withdraw from disposal and to reserve to the Crown all rights within the said Provinces and territories to radium, and to other minerals which may contain radium in sufficient quantity for commercial extraction.

RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

That the Government of the United States was rich beyond the wealth of Crœsus in radium in the carnotite found in the sandstone of Colorado and Utah was heralded from ocean to ocean. The whole world turned its attention this way. Speculators who wanted to profit by the find were flocking to the grounds to take from the people and appropriate to themselves this inestimable wealth.

A great and progressive Secretary of the Interior—unfortunately astride a lazy and halting donkey—sounded the alarm and begged the powers that had authority in this country to act for the people. Had there been a Theodore Roosevelt in the White House, with the forward command of a progressive party to spur him on, the radium areas would have been withdrawn and the people would still be the proud owners of these resources. But upon carefully scanning the Democratic platform it was learned that there was nothing in that document about radium; and, as the President told the suffragists, he could not start anything that the platform had not mentioned. So the President said nothing about radium. Secretary Lane again warned the Members of Congress, and the gentleman from Illinois, Dr. FOSTER, introduced a resolution withdrawing from private entry the affected areas. The Public Lands Committee wanted to get this resolution, but Dr. FOSTER wanted it to go to his committee—the Committee on Mines and Mining. The question of reference was the preliminary struggle referred to in the first of these remarks. The House stood by Dr. FOSTER and his committee got the resolution. A similar resolution has been pending all this time in the Senate. What has been accomplished toward withdrawing those lands? Absolutely nothing. If Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot had moved after that fashion the coal of Alaska would to-day be the property of the Guggenheims instead of the property of the people.

If any Member wants to discover one just cause of popular distrust of Congress by the people, let him read the House and Senate hearings on this radium proposition and ponder over the fact that Congress has done absolutely nothing while these lands have been entered in Colorado and Utah by private persons for private purposes at such a rate that all the best claims are now gone. The whole proceeding is nothing short of shameful. When Gifford Pinchot recommended the withdrawal of the principal Alaska coal fields and President Roosevelt followed his advice, Mr. Pinchot became the subject of every conceivable slander and abuse by a band of men who wanted to appropriate those lands. Because he saved these coal lands for the people and had stopped lootings of the public domain by railroads and timber syndicates he incurred the enmity of all who had heretofore profited by the loose way in which public-land matters had been administered.

In recent debates on this floor Mr. Pinchot has been falsely accused by a Representative from the State of Washington in this connection. In substance it has been declared that he was responsible for all the frauds perpetrated under the lieu-land law he did not succeed in preventing, on the theory that if he could prevent one fraud he ought to have been able to prevent all. He has been denounced in particular because he did not stop the railroad raids on the public domain, although he was not in any official position where he could regulate such matters at the time; but it is said that he stopped some of these things by extra-official warnings. Take the Santa Fe Railroad exchange, for example, about which my colleague from the State of Washington has denounced Mr. Pinchot. This exchange was managed entirely by the Department of the Interior. Mr. Pinchot was in the Department of Agriculture. He had no responsibility of any sort, shape, or kind in connection with it. Mr. Pinchot was given charge of the national forests in 1905. The Santa Fe exchange was made several years before that time.

He has also been accused of allowing the Santa Barbara Water Co. to exchange 63,000 acres of the public domain for land they themselves estimated at 25 cents an acre, and it has been stated on the floor of this House that Mr. Pinchot indorsed the transaction. The fact is that he investigated the disposal of the Santa Barbara lands and the claims that these lands, then owned by private interests, were needed by the public for a watershed. He reported that these lands were needed and ought to be acquired by the Government, stating in his letter of approval that he did not know what lands were to be accepted in exchange, but understood that lands in the Dakotas were to be exchanged. Yet it is charged that he approved in this letter of an exchange of the Santa Barbara lands of the Government for certain worthless lands. The simple truth is he did not do anything of the sort.

The State of Washington and the great Northwest owe to Gifford Pinchot a debt of gratitude which can never be paid, and I am unwilling to have these unfounded charges go unchallenged. They do not contain the slightest merit. The plain people of the Northwest love Mr. Pinchot and stand by him in every argument, but there is not a land crook or a crooked land lawyer on the Pacific coast that does not hate him with all the pent-up hatred of a disappointed highwayman.

Mr. Pinchot is now a candidate for the United States Senate from the State of Pennsylvania, and these charges made here on this floor by a Representative from the State of Washington have been widely circulated and exploited in the public press and in public documents in the State of Pennsylvania to make false impressions there and deprive him of that support to which he is entitled.

As a Representative of the State of Washington in this Congress, I say that Gifford Pinchot has the confidence of the people of my State, and I wish it were possible for my word to reach every man who has gained a false impression from these widely published charges. I would say to them all that Mr. Pinchot is entitled to the highest credit and to unstinted praise for his service in stopping the land frauds against the people of the United States in the great Northwest.

In order that he may not at any time in the future be wrongly charged in connection with the disgusting fall-down of the executive arm of this Government first and the legislative arm second in this radium matter, I call to the attention of Congress the following warnings that have been sent out recently by Mr. Pinchot on this subject:

NATIONAL CONSERVATION ASSOCIATION,
COLORADO BUILDING,
Washington, D. C.

As president of the National Conservation Association, Gifford Pinchot gave out the following statement with regard to the Foster radium bill for the Federal control of radium lands:

"Every friend of conservation will indorse with keen satisfaction the efforts of the Secretary of the Interior and of Congressman FOSTER, of Illinois, to safeguard the remaining radium lands now in public ownership from monopoly and exploitation by private interests. The bill recently introduced by Mr. FOSTER (H. R. 12741) is not only a conservation measure of high importance but also a great humanitarian measure. This bill will effectively conserve the remaining radium-bearing ores on the public domain and at the same time will encourage legitimate development. It should have the support of every conservationist.

"What is of still greater importance, Mr. FOSTER's bill will devote to public uses all of this invaluable curative mineral now publicly owned and will defeat the efforts of private corporations to monopolize it for their own private profit. Recent experiments indicate how priceless is radium in the fight against cancer and other diseases. In view of this fact the people of the country will have neither sympathy nor patience with the special interests which are seeking to exploit these natural resources for their own selfish advantage.

"The passage of this bill will be a long step forward in the application of natural resources to conserving human life and in promoting human welfare, and will mark one more victory in the age-long fight against disease. Secretary Lane hit the nail squarely on the head when he said:

"'The issue is believed to be one of life and death to hundreds of thousands, and I believe the American people will support any broad-gauged policy that aims to extract from lands now in public ownership sufficient American radium for American hospitals, that thus the poorest patients may secure promptly the treatment now necessarily limited to the selected few.'

"The Foster bill should have the support and indorsement of every conservationist. On behalf of the National Conservation Association I strongly urge its passage."

On March 23, 1914, Gifford Pinchot, as president of the National Conservation Association, issued the following statement:

More than two months have elapsed since a joint resolution was introduced in Congress to reserve to the people of the United States the radium-bearing ores on the public lands. During these two months of needless and inexcusable delay not less than 500 additional claims have been located by private persons, so that their content of radium—the only medical remedy for cancer—may be exploited for private profit instead of being used for the public good. This was the object of those who caused the delay.

It is officially estimated that the loss to the Government on the radium needed for its hospitals and the profit to the grabbers, if the grabbers have succeeded fully in their purpose, will be more than $1,500,000. But this is the smallest part of the loss.

At present at least half of our radium goes abroad. Our Government hospitals need 30 grams of radium at once, while 2 grams is all we have in the United States to-day. There are constantly in this country over 200,000 persons suffering from cancer, of whom not less than 75,000 die each year. One woman dies of cancer out of every eight that die at ages over 35, and one man out of every twelve.

The brutal callousness of the men in Congress and out who by delaying this bill have delayed relief to this army of sufferers, for the sole purpose of extracting an exorbitant profit from their necessities, makes even the offense of the food poisoners look mild and small.

Obstruction by the radium lobby and their friends in Congress could not, however, last indefinitely. After delaying for two months a bill which should have passed House and Senate in two days the grabbers saw that the bill must soon be acted on. Accordingly, secret preparation was made to have it passed in a form that would appear to give the public what it needed, yet which would leave the grabbers in substantial control of the situation.

On March 16 the Walsh bill was reported with amendments which were never discussed in any public hearing nor in any conference with the friends of the measure, and which makes the bill a fraud upon the people of this country. One of these amendments provides that if the Government fails at any time to purchase radium ore tendered to it at any railroad station and derived from any claim reserved for Government use under the bill, and does it just once, then the Government loses forever all right to buy the radium from that claim and from all contiguous claims in the same ownership. As to those claims, the bill is repealed. Congress may fail to appropriate money enough to buy the ore, carelessness, accident, or collusion may intervene—no matter what the cause, if the Government fails just once, the radium monopoly gets the claims free from all control. For, utterly incredible as it may seem, the Government officers are thereupon by this bill debarred from going upon the claims to see that the law is obeyed.

It would seem as if the cynical impudence of monopolists could reach no further. Yet the bill contains another clause, under which all that is necessary to take the radium ore in any claim out from under the provisions of the bill, out of the reach of the Government, and into the sphere of the grabbers, is for the locator of that claim not to know when he locates it that it is valuable for radium. The effect of such a provision needs no pointing out.

Another Senate amendment requires the Secretary of the Interior to pay for radium ore, not a just price but the "market" price. The "market" price of radium is an excessive monopoly price to-day. There is no reason to expect that the "market" price of radium ore, fixed by the same men, will be anything but an excessive monopoly price also. This amendment simply authorizes the grabbers to make the Government pay substantially whatever price they may choose to require.

The Senate amendments to the radium bill are simply infamous. They make it a weasel bill, which withdraws from the people the benefits it pretends to give, and it does so in the interest and at the behest of men who are preventing the relief of human misery, in order to make money out of it.

If this radium bill passes in its present form, every man who votes for it will write himself down the servant of special privilege in one of its most abominable forms. It is such cases as this that supply the reason, and so far as they go the good and sufficient reason, why so many people believe that the political power of private monopoly in Congress is stronger than the obligation of the public good, even when the saving of human life is at stake.

There are some other matters to which I wish to refer. I notice in the RECORD of yesterday, in the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY], that applause was scattered all the way through them. That was a correct and true report of the proceedings here; but the fact is we were engaged in more or less horse play at the late hour yesterday afternoon when the gentleman from New York was talking, and a false impression may be created by the use of the word "applause" in the remarks of the gentleman from New York.

This House was not in sympathy and the country is not in sympathy with any such criticism of the Interstate Commerce Commission as was made by the gentleman yesterday. The fact is, I believe the people of this country heartily indorse the Interstate Commerce Commission for the careful way in which that commission is considering the matters before it. The commission is doing good work and the people are with them, and the people are with Senator LA FOLLETTE in attempting to thwart a well-organized conspiracy to coerce the commission.

There are many of us who read the figures very differently to the way the gentleman from New York reads them. To increase railroad rates as requested, nearly $70,000,000 annual revenue would be handed over to the railroads of the one district. To proportionately increase the rates all over the country would raise the annual income of the railroads about $200,000,000. The Government would then have assumed the responsibility of keeping up these profits. That much added income guaranteed by the Government in the form of dividends ought to increase the stock-market value of the railroad stocks at least twenty times that much, figuring on a 5 per cent basis. That would mean an increase in the value of these stocks of $4,000,000,000. Think of it—$4,000,000,000! That would be equivalent to increasing the national debt by that tremendous amount, for the people have to keep up the interest on the railroad bonds and the dividends on their stocks. Certainly freight rates are paid by the people, as surely as is the tariff. I commend the Interstate Commerce Commission for their deliberation, and I sincerely hope that they will continue to think of Jones, who pays the freight, just as tenderly as of Mr. Railroad Owner, who collects the freight. I am for Government ownership of the railroads, and of course I do not want to increase the face value of their stocks $4,000,000,000 by Government decree.

THE POWER COMPANIES AND LOCAL PUBLIC UTILITIES.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat has taken up, to a certain extent, the proposition of big corporations in this country, and as sure as this Congress is alive, and as sure as adjournment is going to come some day soon, we are facing a great big problem, involving the railroads of this country, and the corporations that are concentrating the control of the municipal lighting plants, street car lines, and the public utilities of the land are involved, as well as the great transportation systems.

There is only one remedy; there is only one relief. You can talk all you want about trust legislation and antitrust bills. They may be efficient or they may be inefficient, but we have got to get practical about this matter.

We have before us in the city of Washington a problem right now that presents a way to bring about a real solution of this particular question. The question of the Government of the United States owning the street car lines and the public utilities of the city of Washington is now a live question, and one that ought to be settled by the Government taking over these lines in the city of Washington without delay and administering them and operating them in a model way, so that the people of the country and the cities of the country can see how these lines ought to be operated, and can gain information and instruction from a model operation here in the city of Washington. There is no use of talking about revising the laws and about regulating. We can not get anywhere in that way. And the cities of this country have taken up the proposition of local municipal ownership of these lines and systems, and as we advance in that way we will settle the problem, and settle it permanently.

MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP OF POWER PLANTS.

It has long been the favorite argument of the special interests that municipal ownership is a failure both abroad and in this country. It is, therefore, not surprising to find that most people in this country believe this. Years ago when the first stories of successful municipal ownership began to reach us from abroad a propaganda was immediately begun to discredit these few current rumors of public ownership and operation. In the light of what we know to-day as to the successful operation by foreign municipalities of their public utilities it is hard to understand how the truth was withheld. With the increased travel abroad and study of municipal problems the misleading statements regarding the failure of public ownership in municipalities in Great Britain, Germany, France, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark fell of their own weight. The careful study of municipal ownership and its results by our authorities on municipal problems began to demonstrate that not only was public ownership and public operation a marked success, but it was more economical and more highly organized than our public utilities and equally as efficient. It is evident to-day that the web of fiction woven by our special interests with regard to public ownership and operation of public utilities abroad has been swept away. This is clearly shown in the increasing number of water and gas utilities which are being operated by municipalities—and as efficient as those under private ownership. The proportion of gas and waterworks handled by private interests are steadily decreasing. Progress is also being made in the ownership and operation by American municipalities of their electric plants and street railways. There are to-day over 1,400 municipal electric plants in this country. But, of course, this is only a dot compared with the privately owned electric plants. There are over 20,000 private water-power plants supplying cities and towns in this country. It is time the citizens of our municipalities should ask themselves the question why this situation is a fact. Perhaps some will say because certain experts—gentlemen who inwardly wear the livery of great corporations—tell us that our cities and towns have the most efficient and economical service to be had, and then they tell of the failures and waste of municipal experiments. Then from the subsidized citizens, and perhaps press, we will hear a loud cry that it is "socialism"; or that it is unconstitutional. They are all cleverly danced before the American people as a solemn warning against the use of their own property by themselves. It happens, however, that there are many practical cases of the success of municipal operations in many sections of our country.

HOW SEATTLE SETTLED THE POWER PROBLEM.

In January, 1902, the citizens of Seattle finally became aroused to the exorbitant and excessive rates and impositions placed upon them by the private utility companies. As a result of this aroused public sentiment, the board of public works submitted a report to its council advocating the installation of a small power plant for operating city light only, or a general power plant for power and lighting. The two plans were shortly afterwards submitted to the people of Seattle. There was strong opposition to the latter plan by the power interests, who made every effort to defeat municipal ownership, but by an overwhelming and large majority the people of Seattle declared for a bond issue for the construction and operation of a municipal plant. A bond issue of $590,000 was voted. It has since been increased, on December 31, 1912, to $4,000,000. To-day, after over 10 years' operation, Seattle points with pride to a lighting and power system which will equal, if not excel, that of any city in the country. It has been said by civic experts that Seattle is the best-lighted city in the world, and this is directly due, in a large part, to its successful municipal system. But figures speak more directly and eloquently as to the success of a proposition than mere generalities. To-day the Seattle municipal system has 27,000 private customers and lights 668 miles of its streets with 8,500 street lamps. For the year ending 1912 a surplus of $320,096 was reported. After paying interest, sinking fund, depreciation, operation, and maintenance, an 8 per cent profit has been paid upon a capitalization of $4,000,000. Mayor Cotterill, in his annual report, says:

The city lighting plant has passed the experimental stage and has also proven its efficiency as a rate maker in competition with a powerful private corporation.

In 1902, when the proposed plant was advocated, the people of Seattle were paying more per hour for light and power than they are to-day.

The fact that the municipal lighting and power plant has been extended from its own depreciation fund and profits—

Says J. D. Ross, superintendent of the municipal system—to the extent of $1,293,000, after providing for maintenance, interest, and cost of operation, is the only answer we could give to the question whether publicly owned plants can be operated as economically as private concerns, for the rates in Seattle, on the average, are probably the lowest in the United States.

PASADENA HAD A POWER PROBLEM.

Several years ago the city of Pasadena also woke up. The price it was paying for power hurt its municipal pride. A private corporation was charging a minimum rate of 15 cents per kilowatt hour. So Pasadena also thought it would try municipal ownership, and voted a bond issue of $125,000. As usual the power interests tried to fight the plan. Municipal ownership and operation, however, has been more successful than its most enthusiastic supporters expected. Power is sold by the city of Pasadena to-day at 5 cents per kilowatt hour. The annual report of the municipal system, in speaking of the success of the experiment, says:

The citizens of Pasadena have saved sufficient by reason of the difference in electric rates to pay for their own plant. This tremendous saving, which must be treated as a credit to the plant, is the people's dividend, and in addition to this great saving to the people the plant remains as a valuable asset, paying its own way from its own earnings.

In fact, from October, 1908, to June, 1912, the Pasadena city government has saved $408,000 in power bills over the old rates. The cost for street arc lights is 23 per cent less and for incandescent lights 40 per cent less than in the private corporation days. At the same time Pasadena claims to be the best lighted city in California. Mr. Koiner, manager of the system, in his recent report, said:

The city of Pasadena proved all claims made heretofore concerning the success of its municipal lighting works with the continued loyal support of its owners. There is no question about making the property a greater success than the people ever anticipated at the time they established this enterprise.

It should be remembered that California, like many other parts of the country, has long been in the grasp of a power monopoly. The successful fight of this city with a grasping monopoly points well a moral that other cities could heed.

CONNECTICUT TOWN OF SOUTH NORWALK.

Not only in the West, but also in the East, you find examples of successful municipal ownership and operation. In 1892, in the town of South Norwalk, Conn., the citizens voted $22,000 for a small power plant. It is needless to say it was commonly considered as a wild venture. The system in operation in this town to-day, however, is valued at about $200,000, and over 88 per cent of its cost has been paid from the earnings. The company for the year ending October, 1912, had a net income of about $66,000, with gross profits of $24,000. The lowest rate for power in New England is found in this town. Of course that is not widely known—there is a reason why. For commercial lighting a maximum charge of 9 cents and a minimum charge of 5 cents per kilowatt hour is made. For power there is a maximum charge of 5 cents and a minimum charge of 3 cents. The story of the fight of this little town for municipal ownership ought to be an inspiration to every monopoly-strangled town or city. In 1900 the Connecticut Light & Power Co. made a flattering offer to the city to take over its plant. By an overwhelming vote the kindness was not accepted. The company then served notice it would apply for injunctions to prevent operation. Various suits for alleged damages amounting to large sums were instituted, and the fight was on. It was a long, lone-handed fight. The matter was finally taken to the supreme court, and after a seven years' contest was decided in favor of the municipal plant. It has cost the town nearly $10,000 in attorney fees alone. But it has won a good fight.

MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP A SUCCESS.

Seattle and Pasadena and the Connecticut town found municipal operation more efficient and economical than private operation. So also 1,400 other municipalities in this country have arrived at a similar conclusion. It is self-evident that the exorbitant rates for light and power to the average consumer bears directly on our external question of the high cost of living. If municipal ownership can reduce this important item, there is not much to be said against it. There are many other instances where it has greatly reduced the price to the consumer. In Marquette, Mich., lighting is sold for 5 cents per kilowatt as a maximum and 2 cents as a minimum charge, while for power 3 cents is the maximum and 1 cent the minimum charge per kilowatt hour. Iola, Kans., charges a maximum of 4 cents for its current. Jamestown, N. Y., charges 4½ cents and Jacksonville, Fla., charges 5 cents. Yet many so-called experts, principally emanating from Wall Street, invariably tell us that the people lose both in cost and service if they operate their own properties. These gentlemen evidently do not speak from facts; besides, let us see how well private ownership serves the people. We find in Brooklyn a maximum rate of 11 cents and a minimum rate of 4 cents is charged; in New York a maximum rate of 10 cents and a minimum rate of 5 cents (incidentally one company alone in New York has accumulated a surplus of $30,000), while in Chicago, St. Paul, Spokane, Pittsburgh, Portland, Providence, Richmond, Reading, San Antonio, Washington, and other large cities a base rate of 10 cents or more per kilowatt is charged. In reply to the repeated statements that large cities can not reduce their rates in justice to "return on capital," it is interesting to note the Cleveland municipal plant has a maximum rate of 3 cents and a minimum rate of 1 cent per kilowatt hour. How much longer will the people of the municipalities of this country allow these fabrications of public-utilities finance to blind them? A thorough investigation made by the Bureau of Labor for 1900 developed the following estimates of the average price between private and municipal plants:

Plants having engines with horsepower of—	Private plants.		Municipal plants.
	Number reporting.	Average price per ampere hour.	Number reporting.	Average price per ampere hour.
50 and under 75	1	$0.0075	3	$0.0055
75 and under 100	3	.0106	1	.0090
100 and under 125	7	.0083	4	.0073
125 and under 150	2	.0125	2	.0071
150 and under 200	7	.0083	7	.0088
200 and under 300	11	.0105	8	.0066
300 and under 400	6	.0080	4	.0113
500 and under 750	17	.0100	2	.0075
750 and under 1,000	8	.0077	1	.0075
1,000 and under 1,500	4	.0097	.....	.....
1,500 and under 2,000	4	.0106	.....	.....
2,000 and under 3,000	6	.0099	.....	.....
3,000 and under 5,000	1	.0090	.....	.....
5,000 and over	3	.0088	.....	.....

This investigation developed that in municipal plants the income from private users during the year exceeded the cost of production, and the municipalities not only obtained free electricity for their own use, but made a profit besides. While, on the other hand, the cost of electricity to the municipality from private plants was always extremely high, the service of municipal plants was equal, if not better, than that privately owned. It has always been a favored argument by the great interests that politics would necessarily enter into the operation of municipal waste, and great stress is always laid upon the waste by mismanagement, which will necessarily follow; but the Bureau of Labor report proved the contrary. This is what it says:

As regards the average cost, it is seen that in 7 of the groups shown the average cost in the municipal plant slightly exceeds that in the private plants, while in 10 of the groups this cost in the private plants is greater by far than in those municipally owned. These estimates were made for about 500 private plants and 300 municipal plants, but investigation shows, without much doubt, that the municipal plants are both economical and, from a standpoint of efficiency, well able to stand comparison with any privately owned plants.

In its last analysis this whole question revolves around the large profits made by private utility corporations. To-day it is well known that public utilities offer the most inviting field for investment. For example, the net earnings of railroads have increased only 1.37 per cent since 1907, industrials have decreased, while public utilities have increased since 1907 over 31 per cent. There is a very good reason for these increased profits. Electricity generated from water power is a perpetual fuel. After the initial cost of plant and transmission system has been met, there is very little expense except for upkeep and obsolescence. There is no more inviting field of finance, for every man in the community may become a contributor to your dividends. As was said in a recent article by experts on the subject:

With advancing civilization and the rapid growth of our cities, electricity will become increasingly essential for our well-being, and it will be brought more forcibly home to us than ever that we can not, without great jeopardy, permit interests that are inimical to the general welfare to control it.

The whole question rests on the initial cost of power as compared with the ultimate price to the consumer; and yet, as fundamental as the comparison is, there seems to be little effort to get the facts. The Prussian Government in recent experiments has developed that power can be generated by electricity for 0.0952 cent per kilowatt hour, at which price the Prussian State will develop and sell power to the municipalities of Cassel and Gottenberg.

At the Puget Sound Navy Yard the cost of generating electricity is a slight fraction over 1 cent per kilowatt hour.

In the city of Washington the consumers pay a base rate of 10 cents per kilowatt hour. The electricity used by the city is furnished by a private corporation. This company is closely related to one of the two street railway systems. It is perhaps unnecessary to say that this private corporation has a monopoly of light and power. It is estimated by the report of the Army Engineers that the Great Falls of the Potomac will generate sufficient power for the uses of the District and Federal Government. The estimated cost of the power project is $9,000,000. I shall give my hearty support to the recommendation for legislation for the construction of this plant. But above all I believe there should be immediate provision for the sale of power to the citizens of Washington. In doing so I believe we will contribute largely to awakening the people of municipalities throughout the country who are to-day paying unfair and unreasonable rates to private corporations.

The story of how the street railway corporations in this city have for many years defeated the public welfare of this community is well known throughout the country. It reflects no credit upon our National Government. In this connection a recent editorial in a New York paper is an interesting comparison with the present situation in this city:

Toronto, Canada, population 410,036, is making its street railway company pay rent for the use of its streets at the rate of $2,437 a day. Besides that, Toronto rates of fare are, for the rush hours, 8 tickets for 25 cents—nearly a 3-cent fare.

Detroit, population 465,766, charges 4 cents fares, and after the street railways have taken in $3,000,000 in any one year the city takes one-fifth of the gross receipts thereafter.

Paris, France, population 2,846,986, has a subway like New York, built by the city, but leased to private operators. The city gets 2 cents of every 5 cents paid.

Chicago, population 2,185,283, recently received $2,500,992 as its 55 per cent of the net earnings of the Chicago street railways. The city's share is $695,048 more this year than last and far in excess of any other year's profits since the city went into partnership with the traction company. Nothing is more certain than that the city's profits will increase year by year in the future.

In the commissioner's recommendation, recently submitted for the city of Washington, there is no provision for the use of this power for the operation of municipal railways. But I feel, with the passage of this legislation, will shortly come legislation for the ownership and operation of the street railway by the District of Columbia.

I hope we will get down to practical common sense and will put an end to the private ownership of these tremendous public utilities in this country. The city of Washington ought not to be the last; it ought to lead.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has one minute remaining.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to consume it, and I will ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the Argentine Republic, Belgium, Chile, China, Cuba, and the Netherlands and Luxemburg, at $12,000 each, $72,000.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman want to strike out the words "Argentine Republic" and "Chile," in line 4?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I will ask unanimous consent in a few minutes to go back. Let the Clerk read now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] asks unanimous consent that the paragraph just read be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, is not the purpose of that to insert items for Argentina and Chile?

Mr. GARNER. To change those items. They have now the rank of ambassador.

Mr. MANN. I think nobody would have objection to inserting them now.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I was trying to figure out how we had best do that.

Mr. GARNER. Strike out the words "Chile" and "Argentine," in line 4, page 2.

Mr. MANN. Just insert them in this paragraph, and when you reach the other strike them out.

Mr. GARNER. The trouble is we have passed the first paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I think not.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment in line 11, page 1, to insert the word "Argentine" after "Austria-Hungary," and "Chile" after the word "Brazil."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] asks to amend the paragraph read——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I want the word "Argentina" after the word "Austria-Hungary."

Mr. MANN. It is carried here under the name of "Argentine Republic."

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The proper name is "Argentina."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 11, by inserting, after the word "Austria-Hungary," the word "Argentina," and after the word "Brazil" insert the word "Chile."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman that he ask leave to have the Clerk correct the totals here and wherever else these changes are made.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. What I wanted to do was to insert "$227,500" instead of "$192,500."

Mr. MANN. There will be a number of these changes made. It is well to have the Clerk change the totals.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] asks unanimous consent that the Clerk have a right to correct the totals. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 4, strike out the words "Argentine Republic."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to amend, on page 2, line 4, by striking out the words "Argentine Republic."

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. And then the word "Chile."

Mr. MANN. Let the Clerk report the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 4, by striking out the words "the Argentine Republic" and the word "Chile."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Secretaries of embassy to Austria-Hungary, Brazil, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Russia, Spain, and Turkey, at $3,000 each, $33,000.

Japanese secretary of embassy to Japan, $3,600.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment. On page 2, line 22, after the words "Austria-Hungary," put in the word "Argentina," so that that embassy can have a secretary just as these others, and, after the word "Brazil," put in the word "Chile."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 22, by inserting after the words "Austria-Hungary" the word "Argentina" and after the word "Brazil" the word "Chile."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. After "secretaries" the Clerk ought to be authorized to change the totals.

Mr. GARNER. He has unanimous consent to do that now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Secretaries of legation to the Argentine Republic, Belgium, Chile, China, Cuba, and the Netherlands and Luxemburg, at $2,625 each, $15,750.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 3, line 3, the words "the Argentine Republic," and, in line 4, strike out the word "Chile."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 3, by striking out the words "the Argentine Republic," and, in line 4, by striking out the word "Chile."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second secretaries of embassy to Austria-Hungary, Brazil, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Spain, Mexico, and Russia, at $2,000 each, $20,000.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to amend, page 3, line 21, by the insertion of the word "Argentina" after the words "Austria-Hungary" and the word "Chile" after the word "Brazil," on line 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 21, by inserting, after the words "Austria-Hungary," the word "Argentina," and in line 22, after the word "Brazil," inserting the word "Chile."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of secretaries, not exceeding two, detailed to duty in the Department of State, $3,600, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. What is the purpose of this item—

For salaries of secretaries, not exceeding two, detailed to duty in the Department of State?

That means secretaries of what?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It is a new item. The State Department now, when it has any matters of peculiarly engrossing importance in any particular part of the world, takes a secretary of legation from that part of the world and brings him here and puts him in a clerkship in the State Department. He gets the pay of that clerkship, but he is recalled from a position that is more remunerative, because he has peculiar knowledge of the affairs under consideration; and the object of this item is to give these secretaries the salaries they receive at their regular posts of duty and to enable the department to put others in their places.

Mr. MANN. What is the object of calling a secretary here, a secretary of an embassy or legation, who is to be an official in the State Department.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The item reads:

For salaries of secretaries, not exceeding two, detailed to duty in the Department of State.

They are not officials of the State Department.

Mr. MANN. They come under the heading "Secretaries of embassies and legations."

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It comes under a general heading.

Mr. MANN. If these are clerkships, they should be called clerks; but evidently they are secretaries of embassies and legations, detailed in the State Department at $1,800, which is less than the salary of the secretary of an embassy.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No. The purpose of the State Department is that they will have to call secretaries of legations and embassies here to fill these places temporarily. They do not keep them here all the time. Sometimes it is not necessary to have them here. It is intended to give the man who is detailed here the same salary that he receives at his regular post of duty.

Mr. MANN. Is it intended to keep the same two here all the time?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; they are to be changed about; but when they are detailed here it is desired to keep them on the same salary they are now getting.

Mr. MANN. The secretary to a legation or embassy now receives $2,000 and over abroad. Is it the purpose to transfer them here and pay them a salary of $1,800?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I said it was the purpose of the State Department, when they detailed these secretaries here, to pay them a salary equal to the salary at their regular posts, and then to detail somebody for the time being in their places. It enables them to bring secretaries here for this duty without vacating any secretaryship from which they are detailed.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman will see that all of these secretaries of embassies and legations receive a salary of more than $1,800 a year. Now, the gentleman says that it is the intention to detail those secretaries who are on a higher salary than $1,800 to come to Washington, and here they will get only $1,800. I suppose the man who takes their place will get only $1,800, which, I think, is a discrimination.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I have no objection to the gentleman making it $4,000.

Mr. MANN. I do not see any reason for it at all yet.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is the reason the State Department gave to the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, why should the departmental employees be carried in the Diplomatic and Consular bill at all?

Mr. MANN. Of course they should not be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If they want secretaries in Washington, why not carry them in the legislative bill, where they would belong?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They are not departmental employees. They are detailed from the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some one has an idea that if we send a man abroad in one of these embassies or legations and bring him to Washington he is of more value than those who are located right here. If you call it a detail instead of a permanent appointment, the detail will never end. It is one way of detailing a man to the departmental service with less difficulty than he would otherwise encounter in getting in.

Mr. MANN. There are only two secretaries of embassies who receive $1,800 a year under this bill. They are the secretaries of legation to China and Cuba, at $1,800 each. All the others receive either more or less than that amount. Now, I still do not understand whether a secretary at an embassy abroad or a legation abroad is to be detailed and come to Washington, and while he is here draw $1,800 a year or not.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. He is to be detailed from abroad, but while he is here he is to receive the same salary that he received in the post that he occupied abroad.

Mr. MANN. Then he will not be paid out of this item?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Paid out of this item.

Mr. MANN. He can not be paid out of this item.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. He may not stay here a whole year. He may only stay a few months. They may not consume the whole of this $3,600, but they will consume so much of it as is necessary.

Mr. MANN. This is for two secretaries, $3,600. I think the auditor's office will construe that at $1,800 a year.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. If they do, he can get only $1,800, if he stays a year.

Mr. MANN. It would be very unfair.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Not as unfair as to bring a $3,000 man here and put him down in the State Department at $1,500.

Mr. GARNER. May I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that possibly by changing the language of this item so as to make it available in the discretion of the Secretary of State, and make it available to pay for the services of secretaries detailed from abroad, that might accomplish what he is trying to get at.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. If that will meet the objections made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]——

Mr. GARNER. This is really an emergency fund, out of which they can make up the salaries of gentlemen who are detailed to do work here, who do not get as much money here as they get in their regular occupation abroad.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think the language in the bill is very clear, and that it explains the purpose of it. The object is, when these men are detailed, to give them a salary commensurate with the salary they are already getting. It is a new item, which was suggested as a matter of justice to those secretaries who are detailed here, and it appealed to the committee as proper to be done.

Mr. MANN. It would be an injustice to them, and therefore I make a point of order against the item.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. So that the gentleman can not say it would be an injustice to them, I move that the item be amended by inserting $4,000 instead of $3,600. Then there would be $2,000 a year for each of them.

Mr. MANN. I make a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I will reserve it for a moment.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the hearings on this subject. When Mr. Carr was asked about this particular item he explained to the committee that it will not be possible to take ordinary clerks for that particular service; that it is necessary to call in the secretaries of legation, who have particular knowledge on the subject under consideration. And when he was asked by the committee whether such a secretary could not be paid, while serving in the department, the same salary that he receives as secretary of legation, Mr. Carr answered that the department had no right and no authority to pay him the same salary that he receives as a secretary of legation.

I believe that it is a very valuable work which is being performed by these men in the department. Questions arise every day in the State Department that call for particular knowledge as to a particular country. The department calls in these secretaries for the purpose of advising the department with respect to these matters, and if anything at all should be done in this connection, it seems to me their salaries as secretaries of legation should be continued while they are serving in the department.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. As a matter of fact, does the gentleman know what the salaries of the two secretaries who are here now happen to be?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not; but less than their salaries as secretaries when at their posts.

Mr. GARDNER. That is, if they were at their posts to which they are accredited, instead of being in Washington, would they be getting from $1,200 to $1,500?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; they would be getting $2,000 or $3,000; and when they are brought here they get less than that.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman know the names of the secretaries?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; I do not.

Mr. GARDNER. Is one of them Mr. Lachlan?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not know.

Mr. GARDNER. I know he is in Washington; and I understand he is a $3,000 man.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not know the name.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman does not know that there are two $1,800 men then?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do know this, That the statement was made to us that when these secretaries were detailed they had to give them any clerkship in the State Department that happened to be vacant at the time, and that in nearly every instance the compensation of the clerkship had been very much less than the compensation of these men as secretaries at their posts.

Mr. GARDNER. As a matter of fact, did you ask the State Department whether there are two such secretaries here now?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; I did not. Sometimes there are none of them here. Sometimes there is one, and sometimes there are two. There are never more than two.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a further question?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If a secretary of the embassy at Japan, one of whom gets $3,000 a year and another gets $3,600 a year, should for any reason be ordered to Washington to assist here, does not the gentleman think that secretary ought to receive his official salary while he is here?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do; and if he is kept here a month, if he is a $3,600 secretary he gets $300 and if he is a $3,000 secretary he gets $250.

Mr. MANN. Do they not now get that?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. When they are here?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No, indeed.

Mr. MANN. What do they get?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They get the salary of whatever clerkship they can be placed in. They never get as much as their salary as secretary.

Mr. MANN. I think if they are brought here for governmental reasons, when they have no choice about it and are required to come here, they are entitled to receive a salary somewhat commensurate with the salary that they receive abroad; and I think this item would destroy that right.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The Secretary of State and the State Department thought this would accomplish that very purpose. That is the reason we inserted it in the bill.

Mr. MANN. They did not put it in very good form. I will make the point of order, and it can be corrected somewhere else.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For 10 student interpreters at the embassy to Turkey, who shall be citizens of the United States, and whose duty it shall be to study the language of Turkey and any other language that may be necessary to qualify them for service as interpreters to the embassy and consulates in Turkey, at $1,000 each, $10,000: Provided, That said student interpreters shall be chosen in such manner as will make the selections nonpartisan: And provided further, That upon receiving such appointment each student interpreter shall sign an agreement to continue in the service as interpreter to the embassy and consulates in Turkey so long as his said services may be required within a period of five years.

Mr. MANN. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia whether he has any information as to these student interpreters. We have carried the item in the bill for several years. What is the situation about the 10 student interpreters in Constantinople?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They supply the places of clerks and secretaries to the embassy, the legation at Persia, and other places. The statement made to the committee was that it was necessary to keep 10, or as many as could be gotten, in order to keep up a supply of men who speak that language in these different countries.

Mr. MANN. We have carried 10 student interpreters to Turkey for many years. I do not know whether the number has been increased or not, but they all agree to serve five years after their student days are over. What do we do with them and what do they do? Do they just get a nice trip abroad and an education at the Government's expense, or do they really remain in the service?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They remain in the service.

Mr. MANN. Where do they go?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They remain with the embassy at Turkey and act as secretaries and clerks, and at legations of countries where their language is spoken.

Mr. MANN. I wish at some time some member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs would get us accurate information as to who these student interpreters have been and where they are now.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Does the gentleman mean to get their names?

Mr. MANN. Yes; so that we may know whether they remain in the service.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I have a general statement here from the State Department, but it does not give the names of the individuals.

Mr. COX. How many are there now?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. We have sometimes five, sometimes six, sometimes more. The State Department says it is hard to get young men to go there as students.

Mr. MANN. I guess there is no trouble in getting young men to go over there and study when they get their tuition free and receive $1,000 a year.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is all they get, and it costs that to live.

Mr. MANN. But they get their education.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes, so far as speaking this language; but it is not worth very much to them, because they have to be Americans. I understand it is difficult to get young men to take up this branch of study.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know how much money was used during the last fiscal year for this purpose?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think they had only six students last year.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, FOREIGN MISSIONS.

To enable the President to provide, at the public expense, all such stationery, blanks, records, and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs as he shall think necessary for the several embassies and legations in the transaction of their business, and also for rent, repairs, postage, telegrams, furniture, typewriters, including exchange of same, messenger service, compensation of kavasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, including compensation of interpreters, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, San Francisco, and New Orleans, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of embassies and legations, and for printing in the Department of State, and for loss on bills of exchange to and from embassies and legations, and payment in advance of subscriptions for newspapers (foreign and domestic) under this appropriation is hereby authorized $388,435.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether that is two paragraphs or one.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It is one paragraph.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will see that there is an error, then, in printing the bill, where it says "total, $388,435." That should be inserted after the word "authorized." That is an appropriation for one item, and there is no total about it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is the way the bill reads.

Mr. MANN. I see; I have the former copy of the bill. Now, there is another question I want to ask the gentleman. I see it carries an item for stationery and postage and for printing for the Department of State. I would like to ask the gentleman whether any of that money can be used for circularizing Congress or the newspapers in behalf of particular legislation?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think not.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that there is a law which forbids the use of money in any appropriation bill for the maintenance of a news bureau, and I have a recollection of a rule of the House that provides that communications intended for the committees of the House shall be sent from the departments through the Speaker. But I hold in my hand a communication, which I think all Members of Congress have received, in an envelope of the Secretary of the Interior, and the envelope reads:

Department of the Interior, office of the Secretary.

It came through the post office containing a number of items, and this is one of them:

Congress has much important business to transact before adjournment, but it will be a big mistake if it neglects to pass the Ferris bill, providing for carrying out the plan of Secretary Lane for utilizing the million acres of coal and oil lands in the West that have been, under Republican policy of conservation, of no use whatever to the people.

I would like to know whether there is any limitation in this appropriation to prevent the Secretary of State from violating the proprieties, if not the law, by sending out officially on stationery printed in his department under a penalty envelope, a lobbying propaganda addressed to Members of Congress and newspapers throughout the land. This is a gross violation of the proprieties, not to mention the law.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. What is the parliamentary situation of the proceedings?

The CHAIRMAN. There has been no motion made and no point of order reserved.

Mr. MANN. I thought that I moved to strike out the last word, but if I did not I will do so now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman knows that there is a law prohibiting the use of a fund appropriated for one purpose for any other purpose. This item appropriates a specific sum for a particular purpose, and it could not be used for any other purpose without violating the law. I can assure the gentleman that the Secretary of State will not violate the law by converting this appropriation to any such purpose.

Mr. MANN. It appropriates for stationery and postage and for printing in the department.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It is the stationery and postage for foreign mission and not for circularizing Congress or any other purpose than those stated in this bill.

Mr. MANN. No; it is for printing, and also for printing in the Department of State. I do not think there is any appropriation anywhere in any department for circularizing Congress. I should have really supposed that about the last man in the Cabinet, if not in the country, to violate the proprieties and the law would be Secretary Lane, for whom I have the highest personal and official respect.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is mistaken. This item only applies to stationery for the embassies and legations. I expect, also, that when the gentleman ascertains the facts in the matter he will find that Secretary Lane has never violated the law nor the proprieties of the situation. I do not know anything about the circulars that the gentleman speaks of. I have not received a copy of it, but I do know the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. I do not know who did it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I agree with the gentleman that Secretary Lane would be the last man in the Government to violate the law or the proprieties of his position.

Mr. MANN. I have the envelope. The gentleman has probably received one, but has not seen it. It comes from the Secretary's office, and not only urges the passage of the bill, but urges it on partisan grounds, wholly violating all of the proprieties.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I have no doubt the stationery was paid for out of a proper fund. I know nothing about it; but I know that Secretary Lane has done nothing wrong or improper.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This is the paragraph which carries the provision for the rent of our embassies and legations. A different policy is suggested by the department toward our various embassies in respect to the allowance for rent. This subject is directly related to the establishment of Government-owned embassies and legation buildings. In a letter from the Secretary of State he states that we have been allowing $15,000 for rent for the embassies at Berlin and St. Petersburg, whereas at London we allow only $7,000; at Vienna, $5,000; at Paris, $6,600; at Madrid, $4,440; and at Rome, $3,525. The increase in this appropriation of some thirty-odd thousand dollars is to make provision for a greater allowance for rent for all of our legation and embassy buildings?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman is mistaken in that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not all, but those enumerated?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Just the embassies.

Mr. STAFFORD. Just the embassies. I would like to direct this inquiry to the gentleman, whether in the embassy buildings at St. Petersburg and Berlin the rented quarters are not used also for the chancellery as well as for the dwelling of the ambassador?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Whereas in these other places the rent is merely for the chancellery?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the proposed policy of the department to require the diplomatic officials to have the chancellery and the residence in one and the same building, as far as embassies are concerned?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. As far as that can be arranged, if they can get a building that will do for both the residence and the chancellery, that is the purpose of the administration, as is shown in the provision of this bill further on providing for building embassies and legations, which provides that the home of an ambassador or minister and the chancellery shall be in the same building.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will depend largely upon the personal tastes of the ambassadors. I can easily conceive that some of our ambassadors would decline to live in quarters that would be provided for such a small sum as $15,000 a year. They would absolutely refuse to consent to accept the appointment if they were compelled to live in any such democratic quarters as that would provide. These ambassadors, both of the present administration and of the past, who have had extravagant tastes and luxurious surroundings at home and abroad, would absolutely refuse, because it would not be in consonance with their extravagant style of living.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course if this policy is to be inaugurated—and I wish to commend the policy of the present Secretary of State—if he is going to enforce it it will result in resignations from some of these highbrows, these aristocratic diplomatic officials who have accepted appointments under a different status.

I notice before us our distinguished and esteemed Representative from Ohio [Mr. SHARP], who has been mentioned very prominently for the post at St. Petersburg. I assume he could not have considered that post, if there had not been a provision, which has been carried for years and years, of $15,000 for both embassy and chancellery. He is a Democrat of the old school and believes in living in a democratic fashion, and he permitted his name to be used in that connection largely against his will, because with the qualifications, through long training here, to fill that post eminently and satisfactorily he could maintain himself and the dignity of the station on the salary and the allowance for rent; but when we consider these other officials, who are reputedly worth millions of dollars, I question whether they would want to be limited to any $15,000 dormitory of the Government at these other places.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. What! Five minutes has expired in less than two?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to ask for two minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I asked for five minutes. I will now ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire whether the gentleman does not realize that if the Secretary of State is going to insist on this modern Democratic idea for all ambassadors, living in consonance with American standards, some of those who have been recently appointed will not resign, because this will be inconsistent with their prior mode of living.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not know of any of them who will be likely to resign, except some who have held over from the last administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, they have been gotten rid of long ago. These posts were passed over to those who furnished the fry very shortly after the present administration came into power. I need not mention the names, because the gentleman knows many of them who have had these appointments handed to them because of campaign contributions and other favors extended to the Democratic administration in the last campaign.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; I do not know anything like that, but I do know that the gentleman is mistaken when he says that all those who were appointed in the last administration have resigned.

Mr. STAFFORD. What ambassador other than the one at Paris?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The one at Argentina.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not an embassy.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It is an embassy now.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not yet.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; the President has signed that bill.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I merely want to suggest to the gentleman that Mr. Garrett, from my State, is the minister to Argentina, and he was appointed by Mr. Taft and reappointed by Mr. Wilson.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is one of the rare exceptions where the present administration was almost forced to recognize worth.

Mr. LEVY. Nearly all the consuls general appointed——

Mr. STAFFORD. We are not talking about consuls; I thought the gentleman from New York was awake. We are talking about ambassadors. This had nothing whatever to do with consuls. The gentleman has been here right along, and I thought he was going to inform us about some of the aristocratic constituents of his appointed to these ambassadorial places, and he rises to inform us something about consuls general when this has nothing whatever to do with consuls general.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman asks a question and then does not give anyone a chance to answer.

Mr. STAFFORD. I certainly thought the gentleman from New York might know, but he did not give any information.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman referred to the aristocratic constituency of the gentleman from New York. I want to say the only New Yorker who has been appointed to one of these ambassadorships was appointed to the place where they get $15,000 a year, and he is living in that building, and in that building is the chancellery.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman where that ambassador is who only gets $15,000 a year?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. For rent; and at Berlin.

Mr. MANN. For rent?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is what we are talking about; we are not talking about salaries.

Mr. LEVY. I want to say to the gentleman, my constituents are all Democratic people.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I am surprised the gentleman is here representing that constituency.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Did the gentleman from Wisconsin make the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not, and I do not.

The Clerk read as follows:

TRANSPORTATION OF DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR OFFICERS IN GOING TO AND RETURNING FROM THEIR POSTS.

To pay the cost of the transportation of diplomatic and consular officers in going to and returning from their posts, or when traveling under the orders of the Secretary of State, at the rate of 5 cents per mile, but not including any expense incurred in connection with leaves of absence, $50,000.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A few minutes ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] spoke of a matter arising in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and the chairman of the committee suggested that there was a law against the spending of money appropriated for one purpose for another purpose, and that he believed it was impossible that such a thing had occurred. Still at this very time, according to most reliable information that I have received, there is going on in the Treasurer's office that very proposition of spending money that is appropriated for postal savings for the auditing of money orders and money-order accounts. I brought that to the attention of the Congress and have introduced a resolution asking for the facts, but no attention has been paid to it. I now call special attention to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, through the Auditor for the Post Office Department, is expending money appropriated for the postal savings for auditing money-order accounts, and then the auditor advertises to the world that he is saving a tremendous amount of money to the Government by a cast-iron audit of money-order accounts through machines and piece-rate operators.

No wonder the postmasters of the country are protesting in an ever-increasing number against this audit that is all right until it is tested by making a charge against some postmaster, and then all of a sudden it becomes a farce. I asked Auditor Kram the other day to introduce me to the bookkeepers and to suggest to them to answer my questions as to postmasters' kicks. He refused. I now ask the Acting Secretary of the Treasury to answer the resolution I have submitted as to the facts of this matter.

No wonder the auditor has passed around a paper requiring every employee to sign a "mum's-the-word" agreement. The office loves the dark; it does not want the light.

The other day the auditor dismissed an employee, because he believed she had given out information. Some weeks ago he dismissed another employee, and up to this day he ignores the demand of the Civil Service Commission for the grounds of his dismissal. The Health Bureau wanted to investigate the operation of machines in his office under complaint filed, but the auditor has succeeded to this day in keeping the Health Bureau of the United States Government out of his office.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman speak in opposition to the motion?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, it is with deep regret that I announce to the House the death at Vera Cruz on Wednesday, May 12, of Maurice Welch, late a private in Company A, of the Nineteenth United States Infantry. Gen. Funston, who was in command of the troops in which Pvt. Welch was serving, reports the death in an official dispatch received yesterday, and states that it occurred in line of duty, the soldier being at the time on guard.

Pvt. Welch is the first soldier of the United States Army to die in the conflict with Mexico. This fact can be no solace now to his afflicted family, but as time softens the shock of the present, I trust that the thought may carry with it some measure of consolation.

Pvt. Welch was a constituent of mine, being a native and a resident of Andover, Mass. He comes of that sturdy Irish stock which has already without stint poured out its blood in many a conflict in defense of the United States; from the stock of fighting Jack Barry, whose noble statue we shall see unveiled in Washington to-morrow.

Like the majority of the sailors who have lost their lives at Vera Cruz, Pvt. Welch was little more than a boy. He was born February 19, 1892, but he died for his country for all that. He was serving his first enlistment in the Army, and indeed had barely completed the third month of service. His enlistment dates from February 13, 1914. The Adjutant General tells me that his record though brief was spotless.

He died for his country. May he rest in peace. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL BUREAU FOR PUBLICATION OF CUSTOMS TARIFFS.

To meet the share of the United States in the annual expense for the year ending March 31, 1915, of sustaining the international bureau at Brussels for the translation and publication of customs tariffs, $1,500; this appropriation to be available on April 1, 1914, pursuant to convention proclaimed December 17, 1890.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman how it would be possible to make this appropriation available?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It is not possible now, but it will be available as soon as this bill becomes a law.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it is desirable to put a provision in a bill making an appropriation available for several months before the bill is passed?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Well——

Mr. MANN. I presume they put it in the estimate supposing the bill might be passed by that time, but the department ought not to have submitted an estimate in that form; but I have no criticism of the committee for taking it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It should be stricken out and the words "immediately available" inserted.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants it to be made immediately available, of course that is the way to fix it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment to strike out the words "this appropriation to be available on April 1, 1914," and insert "this appropriation to be immediately available."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, line 1, amend by striking out the words "available on April 1, 1914," and substitute in lieu thereof the words "immediately available."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL (WATER) BOUNDARY COMMISSION, UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

To enable the commission to continue its work under the treaties of 1884, 1889, and 1905, $10,000: Provided, That the Commissioner of the International Boundary Commission, created under authority of the treaty of March 1, 1889, be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the salaries, compensation, and allowances heretofore authorized or approved by the Secretary of State, of any and all persons employed by or under direction of the commission created by the Secretary of State to study the questions in connection with the distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande, from the date to which such salaries, compensation, and allowances were last paid up to and including the 30th day of June, 1914, or until said employees shall be separated from the service, if such separation occurs before said date; and the appropriation made by the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation act, approved February 28, 1913, "To enable the commission to continue its work under the treaties of 1884, 1889, and 1905," is hereby made available for the payments herein authorized and directed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. This is in fact a deficiency appropriation. If it is intended to be utilized at all, it had better be put on a deficiency appropriation bill, where it properly belongs.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The reason we put it here was that it developed in the hearings before the committee that the appropriation of $25,000 which has been made for the International Boundary Commission of the United States and Mexico had not all been used for the payment of the expenses of that commission, but a former Secretary of State had created another commission—a commission for the equitable distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande—and the employees of that commission were being paid out of this appropriation, which was in violation of law and which the committee proposed to stop; but when these facts developed it appeared that many of these men had amounts coming to them, and that commission was deemed by some gentlemen to be more important than the commission which we appropriated for, and we thought it was only fair to those employees, who were not to blame for it, that we should make legal the payment of their salaries and for their services out of the appropriation from which they had been paid.

Mr. MANN. Are they being illegally paid?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; they are not now. They were until recently.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that we have an urgent deficiency bill coming before the House. If these men are to be paid at all, they ought to be paid before the 1st of June. Now, this is a deficiency item, and this bill will not become a law as soon as the other bill. What the gentleman ought to do is to offer this as an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that as soon as this bill passes the Secretary of State will feel at liberty to pay these men out of the appropriations made last year for this purpose. You see that this proviso makes provision for the payment out of appropriations that have already been made.

Mr. MANN. I understand the situation.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. And as soon as the Secretary of State gets authority to pay them he will make these payments, which have been held up since March.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not get the point I was trying to make. This bill probably will not become a law before the 1st of July. The urgent deficiency bill will probably become a law within a week. Now, if these people are rendering the service, having entered the employ of the Government under the supposition that they were entitled to be paid, and the auditor having found there was no appropriation with which to pay them, and the gentleman wants to make a fund available for their payment immediately, he better add it as an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill so that they can be taken care of. It is a pure deficiency.

Mr. GARNER. It is a very small matter.

Mr. MANN. It is not a small matter to the gentlemen who are without their money.

Mr. GARNER. I mean from the standpoint of dollars and cents. The appropriation last year was $25,000 for the boundary commission to determine the boundary between the United States and Mexico. Heretofore they have been paying out of that fund employees who were measuring the water of the Rio Grande with a view of equitably distributing the water between the two countries.

Mr. TOWNSEND. For irrigation purposes?

Mr. GARNER. For irrigation purposes.

Mr. MANN. Not wholly. It covers a whole lot of questions down there.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not these salaries.

Mr. GARNER. Now the gentleman from Illinois will understand the difficulty in certifying from the State Department to the Appropriations Committee and making an estimate for the small amount that could be paid out of this particular fund. It would be some trouble, to say the least of it.

Mr. MANN. It will be no more trouble for the State Department to send an estimate for the deficiency and to go before the proper committee than it is to send an estimate improperly to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. GARNER. They did not send an estimate to this committee. This money has already been appropriated for the fiscal year 1914.

Mr. MANN. Not for this purpose.

Mr. GARNER. Well, no; but it was thought for this purpose.

Mr. MANN. Do I recognize the cunning hand of my distinguished friend from Texas in this item——

Mr. GARNER. The cunning hand of "the gentleman from Texas" never goes into any item.

Mr. MANN (continuing). And not coming from the State Department at all?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Illinois does not understand the situation.

Mr. MANN. I think I understand it better than does the gentleman from Texas. I am trying to help the gentleman get his money.

Mr. GARNER. From what he says I doubt if he understands it better than "the gentleman from Texas," because if he did he would not say that "the gentleman from Texas" had anything to do with it.

Mr. MANN. I simply asked the question.

Mr. GARNER. "The gentleman from Texas" is not interested in this matter, only it was called to his attention, and it affects people in his territory.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman anxious to have these men paid promptly, or does he want to postpone the payment?

Mr. GARNER. I want them paid promptly.

Mr. MANN. Then put it in as an item in the general deficiency bill. It will become a law before this bill does.

Mr. GARNER. They are willing to have it under this bill.

Mr. MANN. They do not understand the parliamentary situation.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Some of them do. One of them was a former distinguished Member of this House.

Mr. MANN. I take it that no Member of this House is getting pay out of it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I said a former Member of this House.

Mr. MANN. Well, that does not indicate knowledge. I make a point of order on the proviso, Mr. Chairman, first, that it is not authorized by law, and, second, that it is a deficiency appropriation over which this committee has no jurisdiction. I refer to the language beginning in line 9, page 11.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I concede the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman they can probably get this item in the urgent deficiency bill, where it will do some good.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a statement to the committee with reference to the amount carried in this bill. The committee has carried this year an appropriation of $10,000, when the estimate, I believe, was for $25,000. Now, the committee, as I understand from the hearings, arrived at this amount upon the theory that under present conditions in Mexico the boundary commission would not be able to do any work, and that undoubtedly was a fact. But it looks at present as if the relations between this country and Mexico might become settled and the diplomatic conditions may be such that this work can be done. I want to suggest to the committee that there is a very urgent need for this work. There is an example before this Congress and before the country showing the absolute necessity of marking these bancos and determining definitely the boundary between this country and Mexico. You all remember what was known as the Vergara case, where a man, a citizen of Texas, was killed in Mexico and his body was recovered. It became quite a notorious case. Now, that gentleman lived near an island in the Rio Grande River between Texas and Mexico. No one could tell whose property that island was, whether it belonged to Mexico or whether it belonged to Texas, and to confirm that the land commissioner of Texas himself has rendered an opinion that he can not tell, and will not be able to tell, until this boundary commission under this treaty has determined where that line is, whether that banco belongs on the Mexican side or on the Texas side. Now, if we do get back on friendly and diplomatic terms with Mexico——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARNER. In just a moment. It is very essential to the people living along that boundary there that this boundary line should be determined. It has been determined down to a certain point, and these bancos have been marked, but there are about 68, if I am correctly informed, that are still unmarked and still undetermined. The two countries have never had any trouble in arriving at an agreement. I want to say in this connection that Gen. Mills, in my judgment, has rendered a very distinguished service in this matter. I say it for the reason that when I came here I was very much prejudiced against his work, and one of my first efforts—and I think some gentleman will bear me out in that—was to cut out this whole appropriation, because I thought it was money illy spent. But Secretary of State ROOT came before the committee and said:

If you cut out that appropriation of $35,000, I believe it will cost me a greater sum each year to adjust these differences.

Twice before the committee he reiterated that statement when I was making an effort to cut it out. Mr. Knox came along and did the same thing after a thorough investigation. I have not had the honor of being on the committee since the present Secretary of State has had charge of the matter, but I have been thoroughly convinced that it is a matter of economy to continue this commission to settle the differences between the people of Texas and the people of Mexico as to the boundary line.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want to increase the amount?

Mr. GARNER. I believe it ought to be increased to $15,000.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing to vote with the gentleman, but I would like to ask the gentleman whether—and I value his judgment in these matters very highly——

Mr. GARNER. I am much obliged to you——

Mr. MANN. Whether it is worth while to go ahead fixing the boundary line between the United States and Mexico on the Rio Grande in view of the fact that it will soon have to be relocated a little farther south?

Mr. GARNER. Of course, if it would have to be "relocated a little farther south," there would be no necessity of deciding permanently this boundary line; but that matter has not been decided.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me right there for a moment?

Mr. GARNER. In a moment. If we do get back to the point where we can do this work by the 1st of January, 1915, it will take about $15,000 or probably more, from what I can learn, to continue this work that has been neglected for quite a while now, to the 1st of July, 1915.

Now, I realize that we could come in and ask for a deficiency, but I believe it would be better and more economical if we could appropriate a sufficient amount of money, say $15,000. Some who have been suggesting an increase say $30,000, and others name different amounts; but I believe that $15,000 will be sufficient to continue and do this work efficiently after we renew diplomatic terms with the Mexican people, and I would like the committee to accept an amendment to increase the amount to $15,000. I appeal to the committee, because they know from my service on the committee that I have never been one to ask for a dollar except in the interest of the public service and in the interest of economy.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the committee does not think this appropriation ought to be increased. The Mexican Boundary Line Commission has done practically no work for three or four years, and the appropriation that has been made for its maintenance has been diverted from the purpose for which it was appropriated to the maintenance of another commission. The chief work done in recent years by this commission itself, eliminating the work done by this other commission, which was created without law by the Secretary of State, and whose general expenses were paid out of this appropriation without any authority of Congress—I say, eliminating the work done by that commission, called the "Commission for the Equitable Distribution of the Waters of the Rio Grande River," the main commission has done practically little or nothing except to pay high salaries to people who did very little work. There was a secretary who got $4,800 a year salary, who was secretary to one man only; and in addition to that, he received about $500 for living expenses. Then there was an engineer down at El Paso who received $4,800 a year and an unlimited amount for expenses, to go up and down the Rio Grande in an automobile to do the work of this other commission. Very little work was done for which this appropriation was made, the work in reference to bancos having being suspended. The committee thought, in view of the fact that there might be amicable relations reestablished between this country and Mexico, that $10,000 should be appropriated, and that it would be sufficient to take up the question of bancos and to carry on that work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask for 2 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that no motion is before the committee.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman has moved, as I understand, to increase the appropriation by $5,000.

Mr. GARNER. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman. If the gentleman from Virginia will permit me, I will offer an amendment to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$15,000" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 11, line 9, by striking out the figures "$10,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$15,000."

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the committee carefully looked into this matter. We were not disposed to cut down this commission to an amount upon which it could not live. The committee, I believe, has a high opinion of Gen. Mills and a high opinion of his secretary, but we thought the secretary was being paid too much. It developed that he wrote only a dozen or so letters in the course of a month or two, and was getting this enormous salary. After going over all the facts and taking into consideration the question that amicable relations may be reestablished between this country and Mexico, the committee thought that all of the work that this commission could do between the date of that happy event and the 30th of June, 1916, could be easily paid for, well paid for, with an appropriation of $10,000.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do.

Mr. CULLOP. In view of practically no service performed by this commission in the last three or four years, why make any appropriation at all for it?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. We made an appropriation at all for the reason that this commission is established under a treaty between this country and Mexico. We can not abrogate the treaty; at least it would not be the proper treatment of Mexico by this country to abrogate the treaty by failing to make an appropriation to maintain the commissioner as provided for in that treaty, and we thought that this appropriation would keep the commission alive and would provide for the fulfillment of the obligations that we assumed under the treaty. Then, again, we thought, in accordance with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], that we might resume friendly relations with Mexico and take up again the questions of bancos in the Rio Grande, a number of which could be taken up by the commission, and that they could go to work and settle as many of them as they could when peace is declared and before the next appropriation is made.

Mr. CULLOP. What salary does the commissioner get?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. He gets for himself no salary.

Mr. CULLOP. Where does the money go, then?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It goes to the secretaries and engineers and other employees.

Mr. CULLOP. What work has this secretary to do?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I say he wrote a dozen or more letters in three or four months. That is about the extent of his work.

Mr. CULLOP. I understand that the secretary wrote only a few letters in 90 days?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. And then received a salary of $4,500 a year?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. He does not receive that now. He did receive that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose there is no portion of this money that can be expended at the present time, is there? There is nothing that these commissioners on the part of the United States can do now, is there?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. As long as the present state of affairs exists between this country and Mexico, probably it can not.

Mr. MANN. There is no government in Mexico which we recognize.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No.

Mr. MANN. There are no officials there that we can deal with.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No.

Mr. MANN. No commissioners can be appointed by anybody in Mexico now to work in connection with our commission.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The commission is already appointed, but I know our commissioner is not cooperating with the Mexican commissioner now. There is no work being done.

Mr. MANN. The President has stated to Congress that there is no government in Mexico, and hence, of course, we can not recognize the action of any commissioners in Mexico representing anybody there, because they can not represent any government there.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I say there has been no cooperation between the commissioner on the part of this Government and the commissioner on the part of Mexico since the present unfortunate condition of affairs has existed there.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to press this amendment, and am perfectly willing to let the item stay as it is. What I wanted to do was to call the attention of the committee to the necessity of appropriating for this boundary commission. The gentleman does not seem to understand that there are three treaties existing between this country and Mexico which this appropriation heretofore has undertaken to cover. The Auditor for the State Department has held, and I think very properly, that the money that has been appropriated for the boundary commission can not be used for the purpose of paying a commission to determine the equitable distribution of waters along the Rio Grande for irrigation purposes; and I am very glad he has held that, because the people of my State do not want that commission to interfere with the arrangements that they now have for irrigating their lands in Texas from the Rio Grande; but it is essential and it is economical that this commission, to determine the boundary between this country and Mexico, should be continued and that a sufficient amount of funds should be appropriated for its proper maintenance. Considering the conditions existing in Mexico at the present time, $10,000 may be sufficient. If it is not, of course Congress will be in session next winter, and I can present the matter to the Appropriations Committee, if necessary, and secure a deficiency. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL PRISON COMMISSION.

For subscription of the United States as an adhering member of the International Prison Commission, and the expenses of a commission, including preparation of reports, $2,550.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Was it intentional to make this "commission," in line 10, instead of "commissioner"?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; for the commission.

Mr. MANN. Heretofore it has been "the expenses of a commissioner."

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. MANN. No; I am not mistaken about my statement. I got this item into the bill, and I know.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I may have misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I say heretofore we have made an appropriation for the expenses of a commissioner. The commissioner has been a distinguished constituent of mine, and that is the reason the item is in the bill. Now I ask, was it intentional to change it from "commissioner" to "commission"?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes. Dr. Henderson has been the commissioner before, and the purpose of this provision is to enable the administration to appoint more than one commissioner.

The Clerk read as follows:

The United States shall continue as an adhering member of the International Prison Commission and participate in the work of said commission.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This paragraph and the succeeding paragraph are both in the existing appropriation law, and were put there for the purpose of making them permanent law. If they are permanent law, they ought not to be carried in the appropriation act each year. Of course, if they are not permanent law they are subject to a point of order. If there is any question about their being permanent law, I want to offer an amendment to make them permanent law. If there is no doubt that they are permanent law, then they ought to be stricken out of this appropriation bill, because it is not necessary to carry them.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. Does the gentleman mean that the annual subscription of the United States as an adhering member of the International Prison Commission is $2,550 by permanent law?

Mr. MANN. No; I am speaking of the next item.

Mr. CULLOP. I thought the gentleman from Illinois said the item just read and the preceding one.

Mr. MANN. No; the succeeding one.

Mr. CULLOP. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Virginia has any doubt about this being permanent law, I should like to move to insert the word "hereafter." When this went into the bill before, the intention was to make permanent law of these two paragraphs, so that they would not have to be carried every year.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. My recollection is that they need not be carried here, because they are provided for in a joint resolution passed by Congress several years ago.

Mr. MANN. There was a joint resolution, and then this item was inserted in the appropriation bill to make permanent law. The departments very frequently send in estimates covering matters which are permanent law, but we do not endeavor to carry the same item in the bill every year when it is permanent law.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No. Does the gentleman suggest an amendment?

Mr. MANN. If there is any question about it, I would insert the word "hereafter" in the beginning of the paragraph in each case. Then you will not need to carry it in the appropriation bill again.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Suppose the gentleman offers his amendment, then.

Mr. MANN. I move to insert at the beginning of line 12 the word "hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 12, at the beginning of the line, insert the word "hereafter."

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Have we a law now providing for this prison commission?

Mr. MANN. We have.

Mr. FOSTER. Permanent law?

Mr. MANN. Yes. We have a joint resolution. I think it is permanent law as it stands. When Mr. Sulzer was a Member of the House he had a joint resolution passed on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. Providing that this Government should be an adhering member?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized annually to pay the pro rata share of the United States in the administration expenses of the International Prison Commission and the necessary expenses of a commission to represent the United States on said commission at its annual meetings, together with necessary clerical and other expenses, out of any money which shall be appropriated for such purposes from time to time by Congress.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the light of the recent events connected with the taking of Vera Cruz, I am reminded of some contention in our Committee on Foreign Affairs when this item of appropriation was discussed and the question was raised as to the wisdom and need of this Government participating as an adhering member of such International Prison Commission. I am only confirmed in my statement made at that time, in answering one of my colleagues' objection, that the commission was performing a great and useful service for humanity. Illustrating its need, I have only, indeed, to call the attention of my colleagues to one of the frightful discoveries that were made at the time our sailor boys took possession of the Mexican seaport city of Vera Cruz. Divine Providence sometimes chooses most unusual ways to work out good to man. It is true that up to date the taking of that city has involved the life sacrifice of a score of our young boys; but one thing accomplished by that act was worth that sacrifice, if we go no further. It was to let the sunlight of heaven down into those dark prison cells beneath the level of the sea, rivaling in their horrid conditions, if we attempt to describe them, the description of Byron in his Prisoner of Chillon:

A double dungeon wall and wave
Have made—and like a living grave.

If there was no other purpose secured by the loss of life of those sailor boys, it was a great thing to be able to expose to the world the prison conditions that in their ingenuity rivaled the days existing back in the time of the Spanish inquisition. From these revelations will come a more enlightened and humanitarian treatment of prisoners throughout Mexico as soon as that unfortunate country is restored to stable government.

I hope and believe that the members of this humanitarian commission will take cognizance of the fact that, with all our boasted civilization, with all the enlightenment of the beginning of the twentieth century, we still have in the neighboring Republic of Mexico such a horrid place to which are condemned those who have committed mere political offenses. My own belief is that there will yet be found many—even at the present time—of these cesspools of iniquity that lower men down to the estate of the lowest animal.

When this commission again convenes—and I understand that sessions are held every five years—I hope its members will turn their eyes to Vera Cruz. The commission is well organized and doing a splendid humanitarian work, and has been for 50 years past. If I remember correctly, the United States Government has been a member of the commission for about 20 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SHARP. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHARP. Certainly.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Does the gentleman believe that the United States is blameless in looking into these prisons in foreign countries and not giving more attention to the conditions in our own country?

Mr. SHARP. I am glad that the gentleman has asked that question. I think there is great need of prison reform, not only in this country but in most of the countries of the world. The revelations that have recently come to us by the antiquarians in destroying the prisons of the Middle Ages, and of a date prior to that, only confirm us in the belief that man has always been just a little removed from a state of savagery when it comes to imposing penalties on his fellow man. I do not know when this is going to end. I might take this occasion to say that if I had my way I would abolish capital punishment except in a very few classes of cases. I never would, for any offense, commit a man to solitary confinement for any considerable length of time. More than that, where possible I would open the prison doors and put the men to work on the highways. We recently passed the good-roads bill, involving millions of dollars, and I would use the prison labor all over the United States for that purpose. It would be humanitarian from every point of view.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHARP. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Is that money available, or does the gentleman expect that it will ever be available?

Mr. SHARP. It is not available now; but if there was no money ever available it would still be a saving to both the State and National Governments.

I hope that if our forces find it necessary eventually to take temporary charge of Mexican affairs, as to all similar conditions such as they found at Vera Cruz, where many prisoners, as the dispatches tell us, were confined where they could not see the sunlight, in filthy cells partly beneath the waters of the sea—I trust that the same investigation will be carried out with the same humanitarian results. [Applause.]

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHARP. I will.

Mr. CLINE. I want to inquire what particular benefit the gentleman expects the United States to get by taking part in this commission. Is it not true that we have the best regulated prisons and that they are conducted under the best management of any prisons in any country on earth? Do we get a benefit by imparting that information to other countries?

Mr. SHARP. If we get no other benefit, in the interest of humanity and brotherly love, than the helpful giving of our own superior methods and experience to other countries, that is surely benefit enough.

Mr. CLINE. I am trying to get some expression as to where the benefit lies. Is it in disclosing our own methods of management, or are we expected to improve our own methods by membership in the commission?

Mr. SHARP. Both. We will not only derive much benefit from the views of other nations, but we will impart something of value to them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] asked a natural and proper question. The International Prison Congress met in the United States several years ago; I do not remember just the date. They went through the United States and visited a great many of our prisons, penitentiaries, reformatories, and so forth. It was the consensus of opinion of the foreign delegates that they had learned a great deal from their visit to the United States, and it was the same on the part of our people in charge of these institutions, that they had received a great deal of valuable information, not merely from the meeting of the congress but from the visit of the foreign delegates to these institutions and the suggestions which they personally made there to a number of the people in charge of some of the county, State, and national institutions. A number of the people in charge of some of the county, State, and national institutions wrote me letters, because I had had something to do with the item in the bill, praising the work done by the commission and giving thanks for the valuable information which they had received as prison officials.

Mr. Chairman, I move to insert in line 15, page 13, after the word "that" the word "hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, line 15, by inserting after the word "that" the word "hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAN AMERICAN UNION.

Pan American Union, $75,000: Provided, That any moneys received from the other American Republics for the support of the union shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit, in addition to the appropriation, and may be drawn therefrom upon requisitions of the Secretary of State for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the union: And provided further, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print an edition of the Monthly Bulletin, not to exceed 6,000 copies per month, for distribution by the union during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment in the nature of a substitute, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, strike out lines 4 to 14, both inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Pan American Union, $75,000: Provided, That any moneys received from the other American Republics for the support of the union shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit, in addition to the appropriation, and may be drawn therefrom upon requisitions of the chairman of the governing board of the union for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the union and of carrying out the orders of said governing board: And provided further, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print an edition of the Monthly Bulletin, not to exceed 6,000 copies per month, for distribution by the union during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to substitute for "the Secretary of State" "the chairman of the governing board of the union," who is the Secretary of State.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman who is the chairman?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The Secretary of State.

Mr. CULLOP. And the purpose is to make the Secretary of State the chairman?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; the Secretary of State is already the chairman, and the governing board prefers to refer to him as the chairman of the governing board rather than as the Secretary of State of this country.

Mr. MADDEN. What would be the advantage?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not know that there would be any advantage, except that the other members of the board prefer that their chairman be known as the chairman rather than as the Secretary of State. Then there is another amendment in the language, "for carrying out the purposes of the union, and of carrying out the orders of the said governing board."

Mr. MADDEN. But the question that arises in my mind is this: I suppose the Pan American Union representatives would have the right to elect the chairman of the governing board.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Oh, no.

Mr. MADDEN. They may choose to elect some other than the Secretary of State.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; the Secretary of State of the United States is ex officio chairman of that board.

Mr. MADDEN. By what right?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. By the agreement entered into when the Bureau of American Republics was organized.

Mr. MADDEN. But they could change that agreement, could they not?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Of course they could, and we could stop making this appropriation and withdraw from the union.

Mr. MADDEN. It might be that our distinguished friend John Barrett would become Secretary of State some time, and I presume he would like very much to have the title of Secretary of State instead of chairman of the governing board.

Mr. MANN. Will my colleague yield for a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. My colleague will have noticed that Mr. John Barrett is first to become Senator before he becomes Secretary of State.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I thought he was to become Secretary of State first and then Senator afterwards.

Mr. MANN. No; he becomes Senator first and then Secretary of State, and, of course, that will give us time to change it if it is necessary.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose if he becomes Senator he will become Senator at Large?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman must admit that he would make a very good one.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he has not omitted the title of President of the newly rehabilitated Republic of Mexico?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not sure what titles he gave himself in the communication he marked confidential, indicating the policy he had in shaping the destinies of the world, but I was wondering whether it would not detract something from the dignity of the office the gentleman now holds to take away the title of Secretary of State and change it to the title of chairman of the governing board. I would very much dislike to see anything taken away from the dignity of the office of Secretary of State, in view of my anticipation that my distinguished friend Mr. Barrett is soon to become Secretary of State.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, very well. I was simply going to ask how the gentleman thought it was possible to take away the dignity of the office of Secretary of State at this time?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I did not hear what the gentleman from Washington said.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is not important, anyway.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It is not often that the gentleman utters things that are not important.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. But there is no time to expire on that. I am trying to get enlightenment on this very important subject, and I know that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has the information.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the governing board of the Pan American Union, through the distinguished Director General, to whom the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has alluded, requested the Committee on Foreign Affairs, when they made up the bill, to put these changes in what is the current law, and we failed to do so—forgot to do so. The change has the approval of the present Secretary of State and of the Director General of the Pan American Union and of the governing board of the union.

Mr. MADDEN. I really have no objection to it, except I was afraid it might detract something from the dignity of the office to which our distinguished friend might some time come.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not think he thinks so.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield? How much of this $75,000 is contributed by other nations?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. None of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Before doing that I wish to say that John Barrett reminds me of a man who in its pioneer days moved to Denver and opened a bank. Everybody deposited in this bank. Later on, the bank failed; the banker called a meeting of the depositors and made them a speech, in the course of which he said he had nothing but himself to offer, and they could do with him what they pleased. A man in the audience said, "When you are cutting him up I want to speak for his gall."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to secure some information. Then if no part of this sum of $75,000 is contributed by other and adhering nations, what does this language mean:

That any moneys received from the other American Republics for the support of the union shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit, in addition to the appropriation, and may be drawn therefrom upon requisition to the Secretary of State—

And so forth?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is what it means; in addition to the appropriation herein made.

Mr. COX. As against this fund of $75,000 which we appropriate what funds do the subscribing nations contribute?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Why, we contribute about two-thirds or a little more. It is based on population.

Mr. COX. We contribute, as I understand it, this $75,000, and then adhering nations contribute about a third as much.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Nearly half as much as we do.

Mr. COX. How many nations belong to this union?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Twenty.

Mr. COX. All South American Republics, are they?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a pamphlet that was issued in 1909 in the interest of the Pan American Union. It has been set out in 1913 that the statement of the figures for population and trade, being some four years old, are therefore not to be taken as the measure of the population and trade of these countries to-day—1913—and so forth. Looking through this pamphlet there appears some very interesting data. I read from page 17 of the pamphlet:

Too much importance is now attached in the United States to the idea that revolution prevails all over Latin America, and that, therefore, commerce and investments are insecure.

* * * * * * *

The Continent of South America to-day is free from serious insurrectionary movement, with few, if any, indications of more civil wars. The recent conflict in Central America was unfortunate, but it served to emphasize the firm peace and prosperity of Mexico.

On page 19 I read as follows:

The investment of North American capital in the resources, mines, industries, and in the construction of railways, tramway, and electric light plants in the more peaceful and progressive countries of South America are important considerations.

Then on page 40 I find a statement by Mr. Creel, the distinguished ambassador of Mexico assigned to this country, and a man who stands high both in the financial and diplomatic circles of his Government, that over $700,000,000 of money from the United States are invested throughout his country.

That statement was in 1907. It would be interesting to know just how much it is now.

On page 41 I read a statement in reference to Colombia as follows:

Although Colombia has had the name of being disturbed with internal strife in the past, it is now, through the wise administration of its President, Gen. Rafael Reyes, gradually substituting confidence and quiet for distrust and conflict. Gen. Reyes is doing all in his power to interest foreign capital in the exploitation of the resources of Colombia. He wants to build trunk and branch lines of railroads over its wide area; to open up its mines of gold, copper, and platinum; to improve the navigation of its many rivers; to carry to market the valuable timber of its primeval forests; to put in electric light and street-car lines in its principal cities; and to take advantage of its numerous water powers.

Then I read on page 49:

As a result of Mr. ROOT'S visit to South America a new era has already dawned in the relations of the United States with her sister nations, and it now remains for the capital of this country, accumulated through our past prosperity and looking for new fields, to improve the wonderful opportunity in the great southern continent.

Then I read on page 51:

Resourceful Central America.

I have looked over this pamphlet that appears to be written and edited by Mr. John Barrett, who I think has done a great work in interesting our country in the possibilities both of Central and South America, as well as Mexico, and I rise now, because of the topic before us, to ask whether it is consistent for us to have circulated officially or semiofficially among the Members of Congress and the people generally interested in the possibilities of these Republics; is it quite consistent to in this manner or in any manner attempt to induce capital to invest in those countries, and then when an unfortunate situation occurs as is now distressing Mexico are those citizens thus induced to pack up their grips and move out of the country and leave their property at those places to be destroyed by a situation that we so much deplore? That is the question that I think is really pertinent now, whether we as a Government are acting consistently with the invitation extended to our citizens to invest the capital of this country in those countries. That is all I desire to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, on last Monday I had the honor of attending as a member of the Congressional committee the ceremonies in New York over the heroes who fell at Vera Cruz, and it was indeed one of the most impressive occasions that I have ever attended.

The solemn procession, which began at the Battery, the battalions of bluejackets and marines who marched therein, clean-cut youngsters of the same age as those who died at Vera Cruz, almost boys in appearance, the flag-draped caissons crowned with beautiful flowers, the march with muffled drum and funeral dirge by the naval bands, the tolling of the church bells, the vast crowds who packed the sidewalks to the curb, standing in respectful silence with uncovered heads, the swarm of people at every window and on every roof, the 500 school children who sang at the City Hall "Nearer, My God, to Thee," the little groups of foreign-born children from the public schools of the east side waiting on the curb with American flags in their hands, the crippled children who filled several omnibuses occupying prominent positions, and above all the quiet hush and respectful attitude which pervaded the huge crowd of perhaps 1,000,000 persons, the impressive address of the President at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, the sorrowing relatives seated near me—all made part of a solemn event which I shall never forget as long as I live.

The Montana sailed from Brooklyn Monday afternoon for Boston, carrying the bodies of three heroes who belonged to New England. One of these young men—Walter L. Watson—came from Cape Cod, from Eastham, which is but a few miles from my home town—Yarmouth.

The town Eastham, settled in 1644, is small in area and population, but, like all the towns of Cape Cod, has always been rich in patriotism and has for nearly three centuries produced a noble line of citizens ever ready to serve the country in time of peace or war. The men of Eastham fought in the King Philip War of 1674, assisted in the capture in 1745 of the French stronghold—Louisburg, Cape Breton—and served under Washington in the American Revolution. In the War of 1812, at the naval victory on Lake Erie, Eastham was represented among the fighters on the battleship of Commodore Perry. In the town of Orleans, where Walter Watson used to attend church, the crudely armed militia in this same war repulsed successfully the British forces, while near Eastham Capt. "Hoppy" Mayo, by the use of Cape Cod shrewdness, captured an armed British schooner with her crew of 28 fighting men, so well described in a recent book, which smacks of the sea, by Michael Fitzgerald, of Brewster, entitled "1812, A Tale of Cape Cod." With such a record it is needless for me to say that Eastham did more than her share in the Civil War and all other national wars.

The people of Eastham and Cape Cod have always been famous for their skill and bravery on the sea. At the Nauset Life-Saving Station, which is but a short distance from the old home of Walter L. Watson, and at many other stations which I might name, live the life savers, whose duty it is to risk their lives in order to save those in peril on the sea. They, like their brothers in the Navy, obey orders and go where duty calls them in the service of their country.

Mr. Chairman, I heard Secretary Daniels, at the exercises in the Brooklyn Navy Yard on May 11, announce, in his address to the President, the names of the 19 heroes: Walter L. Watson and Daniel A. Haggerty, of Massachusetts; Rufus E. Percy, of New Hampshire; Gabriel A. De Fabbio, Dennis J. Lane, John Schumacher, Clarence R. Harshbarger, and Albin E. Stream, of New York; George Poinsett, Francis P. De Lowry, and Charles A. Smith, of Pennsylvania; Henry Pulliam, of Virginia; Randolph Summerlin, of Georgia; Esa Hursh Frohlichstein, of Alabama; Elzie C. Fisher, of Mississippi; Louis O. Fried, of Louisiana; Samuel Marten and Louis F. Boswell, of Illinois; Frank Devorich, of Iowa. I heard some French, Hebrew, German, Irish, and Italian names, but I thought of them only as true-blooded Americans right to the core of their hearts, who showed the rest of the country a type of patriotism and devotion which all Americans can copy. Our country is proud of these men.

Walter L. Watson, like most of the young men who fought at Vera Cruz, was very young—but 22 years of age. He came to Eastham when about 10 years of age, and early caught the love of the sea. He entered the Navy on December 31, 1912. His brother is now serving in the United States Cavalry at Fort Sheridan, Ill. A younger brother and sister live at Eastham. His home was with his foster parents, Mr. and Mrs. Edmund L. Knowles. He possessed a charming personality and had many friends in Eastham and Orleans.

Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I saw in the Boston Globe a picture of the young man whom Eastham and all Cape Cod mourn—Walter L. Watson. As I gazed intently at the curly hair, the open, frank eyes, the honest face, in which one seemed to feel perfect confidence and trust, there came before me a picture of the same curly hair and attractive eyes and face of a never-to-be-forgotten younger brother, who bore the same name, Walter. He left us many years ago when but a child, but the name "Walter" has been precious to me ever since.

Why is it that there are some people in whom we implicitly put faith and trust? Is it not because they have noble standards of duty and high ideals, and are ready to live and, in case of need, die for those they love? What is there greater than a life of service, not for one's self but for others and for one's country? Did not Walter L. Watson show this type of manhood and self-sacrifice?

Let us all resolve that from the lesson taught by our brave men who fell at Vera Cruz that we should be better Americans. Let us not forget that Walter L. Watson and the 18 other heroes offered the supreme sacrifice of laying down their lives for their country.

"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

Under the privilege given me I take the liberty of inserting here the address of President Wilson at the exercises in the Brooklyn Navy Yard on May 11, 1914. This address contains such noble thoughts and sentiments so well expressed, and so much better than I can do, that I think it fitting under the circumstances to include the following address:

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT WILSON.

"Mr. Secretary, I know that the feelings which characterize all who stand about me and the whole Nation at this hour are not feelings which can be suitably expressed in terms of attempted oratory or eloquence. They are things too deep for ordinary speech. For my own part I have a singular mixture of feelings. The feeling that is uppermost is one of profound grief that these lads should have had to go to their death; and yet there is mixed with that grief a profound pride that they should have gone as they did, and, if I may say it out of my heart, a touch of envy of those who were permitted so quietly, so nobly, to do their duty. Have you thought of it, men? Here is the roster of the Navy—the list of the men, officers and enlisted men and marines—and suddenly there swim 19 stars out of the list—men who have suddenly been lifted into a firmament of memory where we shall always see their names shine, not because they called upon us to admire them but because they served us, without asking any questions and in the performance of a duty which is laid upon us as well as upon them.

"Duty is not an uncommon thing, gentlemen. Men are performing it in the ordinary walks of life all around us all the time, and they are making great sacrifices to perform it. What gives men like these peculiar distinction is not merely that they did their duty, but that their duty had nothing to do with them or their own personal and peculiar interests. They did not give their lives for themselves. They gave their lives for us, because we called upon them as a Nation to perform an unexpected duty. That is the way in which men grow distinguished, and that is the only way, by serving somebody else than themselves. And what greater thing could you serve than a Nation such as this we love and are proud of? Are you sorry for these lads? Are you sorry for the way they will be remembered? Does it not quicken your pulses to think of the list of them? I hope to God none of you may join the list, but if you do you will join an immortal company.

"So, while we are profoundly sorrowful, and while there goes out of our hearts a very deep and affectionate sympathy for the friends and relatives of these lads who for the rest of their lives shall mourn them, though with a touch of pride, we know why we do not go away from this occasion cast down, but with our heads lifted and our eyes on the future of this country, with absolute confidence of how it will be worked out. Not only upon the mere vague future of this country, but upon the immediate future. We have gone down to Mexico to serve mankind if we can find out the way. We do not want to fight the Mexicans. We want to serve the Mexicans if we can, because we know how we would like to be free, and how we would like to be served if there were friends standing by in such case ready to serve us. A war of aggression is not a war in which it is a proud thing to die, but a war of service is a thing in which it is a proud thing to die.

"Notice how truly these men were of our blood. I mean of our American blood, which is not drawn from any one country, which is not drawn from any one stock, which is not drawn from any one language of the modern world; but free men everywhere have sent their sons and their brothers and their daughters to this country in order to make that great compounded Nation which consists of all the sturdy elements and of all the best elements of the whole globe. I listened again to this list of the dead with a profound interest because of the mixture of the names, for the names bear the marks of the several national stocks from which these men came. But they are not Irishmen or Germans or Frenchmen or Hebrews or Italians any more. They were not when they went to Vera Cruz; they were Americans, every one of them, and with no difference in their Americanism because of the stock from which they came. They were in a peculiar sense of our blood, and they proved it by showing that they were of our spirit—that no matter what their derivation, no matter where their people came from, they thought and wished and did the things that were American; and the flag under which they served was a flag in which all the blood of mankind is united to make a free Nation.

"War, gentlemen, is only a sort of dramatic representation, a sort of dramatic symbol, of a thousand forms of duty. I never went into battle; I never was under fire; but I fancy that there are some things just as hard to do as to go under fire. I fancy that it is just as hard to do your duty when men are sneering at you as when they are shooting at you. When they shoot at you, they can only take your natural life; when they sneer at you, they can wound your living heart, and men who are brave enough, steadfast enough, steady in their principles enough, to go about their duty with regard to their fellow men, no matter whether there are hisses or cheers, men who can do what Rudyard Kipling in one of his poems wrote, 'Meet with triumph and disaster and treat those two impostors just the same,' are men for a nation to be proud of. Morally speaking, disaster and triumph are impostors. The cheers of the moment are not what a man ought to think about, but the verdict of his conscience and of the consciences of mankind.

"When I look at you I feel as if I, also, and we all were enlisted men. Not enlisted in your particular branch of the service, but enlisted to serve the country, no matter what may come, even though we may sacrifice our lives in the arduous endeavor. We are expected to put the utmost energy of every power that we have into the service of our fellow men, never sparing ourselves, not condescending to think of what is going to happen to ourselves, but ready, if need be, to go to the utter length of complete self-sacrifice.

"As I stand and look at you to-day and think of these spirits that have gone from us, I know that the road is clearer for the future. These boys have shown us the way, and it is easier to walk on it because they have gone before and shown us how. May God grant to all of us that vision of patriotic service which here in solemnity and grief and pride is borne in upon our hearts and consciences."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that I remember two or three years ago that the number of these bulletins which were to be printed at the Government Printing Office was increased from 4,500 to 6,000.

And at that time it was said that no Member of Congress received these bulletins regularly, as they had done previous to that time, and so Congress increased the number.

Mr. MADDEN. That was because of the valuable information they contained, was it not?

Mr. FOSTER. Since the number has been increased, as I remember it, they still have received no numbers of this bulletin issued by the Pan American Union. So I desire to inquire of the chairman if he can give us any information with reference to the matter.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I understood they were sending out more of them. That was the purpose of the provision put in the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know what other Members have received. I do not look over their mail, but I am sure there is one who has not received a single number.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield? I will testify to the same fact. I enjoyed that bulletin very much.

Mr. FOSTER. I used to enjoy reading the bulletin, and I had some people who like to receive them.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. All the chairman can do is to promise that you will receive them.

Mr. HARRISON. I think you can get them if you write to Mr. Barrett.

Mr. FESS. I can testify that you can get them if you write for them.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think we ought to be subservient to Mr. Barrett. He is our servant and ought to be compelled to send them.

Mr. MANN. I think he ought to be compelled not to send them. Nobody looks at the bulletin except somebody who is interested in studying Spanish or Portuguese.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Ohio has been reading one here.

Mr. MANN. He was not reading from one of the bulletins at all.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought he was. I have not seen one in so long that I would not know it.

Mr. MADDEN. It was a history of the Pan American Union, by John Barrett, that he was reading from.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I want to break into this discussion long enough to say that I received a letter a few days ago from an important manufacturer in my home city, saying that his company was very desirious of extending its trade in Colombia, Venezuela, Panama, and in Central and South America generally, and asking me to get data from the Pan American Union. So I have directed that the bulletins and publications of the Pan American Union be sent to this manufacturer, knowing that his company will be benefited by them. I have read similar publications of the union with much interest.

Mr. FOSTER. And I will say to the gentleman that I have read them with a good deal of interest.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] called to the attention of the committee the fact that a great deal of money has been invested by Americans in Mexico by invitation of this Government. On the 26th day of February, when trouble was brewing in Mexico and our people had been asked to withdraw from that Republic by our State Department, I called to the attention of the House the fact that that attitude of our State Department would undoubtedly cost this Government many millions of dollars. I have read in the newspapers within the last week or 10 days that hundreds of claims against this Government are being filed by citizens of the United States who left their property in Mexico by reason of the action of this Government in having ordered their departure from that country; and more recently, within the last day or two, I have read in the newspapers that the citizens of Spain who lost their property at Torreon by reason of the ravages of the so-called constitutionalists have also filed their claims for damages with the State Department, and will undoubtedly look to this Government for reparation.

Mr. CLINE, Mr. SHARP, and Mr. FLOOD of Virginia rose.

Mr. KAHN. The sum of $20,000,000 has been claimed as damages for the destruction and looting of the property of Spanish citizens in Torreon alone, and the time will come when the Congress will be called on to appropriate all of this money to pay these claims.

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman; yes.

Mr. SHARP. Suppose that order had not been issued or that advice given to our people living in Mexico, and a massacre had resulted by which several thousand of our people had been killed, does the gentleman say that we would have been justified in not giving that notice that there was serious danger at that time?

Mr. KAHN. I doubt if there was any serious danger at that time. The refugees who returned to this country at the time the order of the State Department was issued were reported in the newspapers to have said there was no need for such action by our Government at that time. There were certainly no outbreaks in the territory that was under the control of Huerta. The only outbreaks that occurred were in the territory occupied by the so-called constitutionalists.

Mr. SHARP. And did not President Taft make the same request while he was still in office?

Mr. KAHN. No; not that I recall.

Mr. SHARP. He issued the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15762) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BAILEY, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DIES, for three days, on account of illness.

CALLING THE ROLL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move the call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

During the calling of the roll Mr. DONOVAN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

At the conclusion of the roll call,

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 261 Members—a quorum—have answered to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I call up privileged House resolution 256.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the resolution by title, as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 256) providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate and report whether any Members have been guilty of violating the provisions of the Criminal Code by soliciting contributions for political purposes, etc.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution and substitute reported by the committee be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the original resolution and the substitute. The Chair thinks the original resolution ought to be read.

Mr. MANN. It ought to be read. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] did not ask to dispense with it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the original resolution and the substitute.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like to know what the "and so forth" in that resolution means?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. MANN. You will never know enough to find out over there. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 256.

Whereas the act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States, approved March 4, 1909, provides in section 118 that no Senator or Representative shall directly or indirectly solicit or receive or be in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States; and

Whereas it is provided in section 119 of said act that no person shall in any room or building occupied in the discharge of official duties by any officer or employee of the United States mentioned in the preceding section solicit in any manner whatever or receive any contribution of money or other thing of value for any political purpose whatever; and

Whereas it is alleged that the Democratic national congressional committee, composed in chief part of Members of this House, has directed to be sent, and it is alleged there has been sent, to the Democratic Members of this House a letter stating that an assessment has been levied upon the Democratic Members of this House, soliciting contributions from such Members for political purposes, and it is alleged that said letter has been signed by a Member of this House and delivered to other Members of this House in the Capitol Building and in the House Office Building, which letter is alleged to read as follows:

"SEPTEMBER 15, 1913.

"At a meeting of the Democratic national congressional committee August 28, 1913, the following resolution presented by Senator THOMAS, of Colorado, was unanimously adopted:

"'Resolved, That an assessment of $100 be made on each Democratic Member of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate, to be paid to the chairman of the congressional committee, as follows: $25 at once; $25 on or before January 1, 1914; balance on or before July 1, 1914.'

"The committee is in debt to the extent of nearly $4,000 and has no money in the treasury. The object of the foregoing resolution is to secure funds with which to pay the debts of the committee and begin the work of the approaching campaign.

"Checks should be made payable to Hon. WILLIAM G. SHARP, treasurer, and handed to ———, member of the committee from your State, who will make return thereof to the treasurer. The entire amount may be paid at once or in installments provided by the resolution.

"Trusting that you will favor the committee with an early payment, I beg to remain,

"Very sincerely, yours,

"FRANK E. DOREMUS, Chairman."

And
Whereas section 122 of said act provides that whoever shall violate any provision of section 118 or section 119 shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of seven members shall be appointed by the Speaker to investigate and report to this House whether any Members of this House have been guilty of violating any of the provisions of the Criminal Code by soliciting or receiving or by being in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States, and particularly from Members of this House, to the end that it may be ascertained whether the Members of this House, constituting in part the law-making branch of the Government, are above the law.

And the first substitute resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That it is no violation of section 118 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit or receive assessments or contributions for political purposes from other Senators or Members of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Are these two resolutions that are submitted as a substitute to be treated as one amendment or two amendments? It is immaterial to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think they would be treated as two.

Mr. MANN. If they are to be treated as two, I make the point of order on the amendment just read that it is not in order; that the committee can not report an amendment which is not germane to the resolution, nor can it report an amendment to a privileged resolution which amendment is not privileged, and that this is not a privileged resolution as amended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, first, I call the attention of the Speaker to page 337 of the copy of the manual which I have, third session of the Sixty-second Congress, that the rule in reference to germaneness applies to amendments reported by committees.

The SPEAKER. What rule is it? What is the number of it?

Mr. MANN. Rule XVI, paragraph 7, the last half of it:

And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

That is a rule of the House. The manual reads:

The rule that amendments should be germane applies to amendments reported by committees—

And cites the precedents in Hinds' Precedents. I suppose that is hardly a contested matter, that the committee can not report an amendment which is not germane to the subject under consideration.

Now, let us see what the resolution is. The resolution which was introduced and which is now pending before the House reads:

Resolved, That a committee of seven Members shall be appointed by the Speaker to investigate and report to this House whether any Members of this House have been guilty of violating any of the provisions of the Criminal Code—

And so forth.

That resolution is for the appointment of a special or select committee. The amendment proposed by the committee in reporting it back is:

Resolved, That it is no violation of section 118 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit or receive assessments or contributions for political purposes from other Senators or Members of the House.

Is a resolution for the appointment of a special committee subject to amendment by an amendment to dispose of the merits of the whole proposition? I have rulings here which I will give the Speaker. In volume 5 of Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 5801, is an old ruling which has been quite consistently followed since. This ruling was made by Speaker Howell Cobb in the Thirty-first Congress:

To a proposition for the appointment of a select committee to investigate a certain subject an amendment proposing an inquiry of the Executive on that subject was held not to be germane.

It is not necessary to read the matter in full; but there, where it was proposed to have a select committee of the House investigate a certain matter, it was held not germane to offer an amendment even to have it investigated by one of the executive departments of the Government.

The Chair will also note at the bottom of page 338 of the manual a number of citations where amendments are held not to be germane.

To a bill relating to commerce between the States an amendment relating to commerce within the several States was held not germane.

To a proposition to relieve destitute citizens of the United States in Cuba a proposition declaring a state of war in Cuba and proclaiming neutrality was held not germane.

To a bill granting a right of way to a railroad an amendment providing for the purchase of the railroad by the Government was held not germane.

In page 5806 of Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, it is held that the rule that amendments shall be germane applies to amendments reported by committees.

In paragraph 5809, volume 5, it is held that it is not in order to amend a pending privileged resolution by adding matter not privileged and not germane to the original proposition.

Where they had under consideration resolutions concerning the assignment of rooms in the Capitol Building an amendment was offered:

And that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire if other and additional accommodations can not be procured for the Library of Congress, by which the space in the Capitol now used for the library can be used for committee rooms, and report the same.

There was a resolution pending, to which a proper amendment had been added, for the assignment of rooms, but it was held not germane to add an amendment directing the committee to make an inquiry concerning further rooms.

That Speaker was John G. Carlisle, and the gentleman in the House who made the point of order was Samuel J. Randall. Those were two very good parliamentarians, and that case was very similar to this.

The SPEAKER. What section is that?

Mr. MANN. Section 5809, volume 5, of Hinds' Precedents. And the very next paragraph is to the same effect, so far as the adding of a nonprivileged amendment to a privileged matter under consideration is concerned.

Paragraph 5841 of Hinds' Precedents. The House was considering a bill to amend the act to regulate commerce. That related to commerce between the States. Mr. Nelson, of Minnesota, offered an amendment, which I will not read, covering the question of commerce within the States. Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, made the point of order that the amendment was not germane to the bill; and the Speaker—there is some question whether it was Speaker Carlisle himself or the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. McCreary, of Kentucky—held that the amendment was not germane. Here was a bill regulating commerce, but it was commerce between the States; and the Speaker held that it was not germane to add an amendment concerning intrastate commerce.

This volume of Hinds' Precedents is filled with precedents of a similar character.

Now, here is a privileged resolution in reference to the appointment of a committee. It brings in an amendment to that, not relating at all to the appointment of a committee, but making a declaration of an abstract proposition, which in itself would not be privileged. I think the Speaker can not hold as privileged any resolution which any Member of the House at any time may choose to offer, declaring that it is no violation of law for a Member of Congress to do certain things which the Criminal Code may say are a violation of law. It would not make any difference, if it was held privileged, it would not make any difference what provision of the Criminal Code was under consideration. As an abstract proposition the privilege of the original resolution lies in the fact that a charge is made against the actual Members of Congress; but it would not be privileged if I offered a resolution—

Resolved, That it is a violation of section 118 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit or receive assessments or contributions for political purposes from other Senators or Members of the House.

If I had left out the word "not" in the resolution as reported from the committee and had offered it from the floor as a privileged resolution, the Speaker would have held that it must be referred to a committee through the basket, that it could not be presented on the floor; and if the Speaker should hold that it was privileged to offer an abstract declaration as to whether a Member of Congress violates the penal code by doing a certain act, that privilege could be exercised as to every provision in the criminal code; and in case of a filibuster it would be a very handy instrument, because it would not take a very large majority to offer a sufficient number of privileged resolutions of that sort, involving no individual or moral responsibility, to keep the House working all the time for a week or a month; and it would be a matter of the highest privilege, if privileged at all.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman say was the gist of his resolution?

Mr. MANN. The gist of my resolution was the appointment of a committee to investigate facts.

The SPEAKER. Do you think the appointment of the committee was the real thing, or was it to find out whether these gentlemen had committed a felony?

Mr. MANN. It was to find out the facts. The real point of my resolution was to appoint a committee to investigate the facts.

The SPEAKER. Is it not true that the House made a ruling of its own on that question?

Mr. MANN. The House made no ruling.

The SPEAKER. Did not the House refer this resolution to the Elections Committee?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Is not the determination of a parliamentary question by the House itself superior to the opinions of any Speaker?

Mr. MANN. It was proper to refer it. It was in order to refer it.

The SPEAKER. If it was in order to refer it, did not we get rid of the committee of seven?

Mr. MANN. Not at all. If it had not been a privileged resolution, I would have dropped it in the basket and the Speaker would have referred it; but being a privileged resolution, it comes before the House, and the House has the right to refer it, and, as I think, the House exercised a proper function when it did. I did not even contest the reference. On the other hand, I suggested that the reference be made.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman say that the appointment of a committee of seven was the gist of his resolution, or was it to find out whether these men had violated the law?

Mr. MANN. Of course the real gist of that resolution was to appoint a committee to find out whether they had violated the law.

The SPEAKER. Why should the gentleman care how he found out, so that he found out, if the House passed on that question?

Mr. MANN. The House did not pass on that question, I beg the Speaker's pardon. The House only referred the matter to the committee to report whether a special committee should be appointed like any proposition of that sort. The only thing the House did was to refer to the committee the question as to whether there should be a select committee appointed. As a matter of fact, the committee referred it to the Committee on Election of President and Vice President. A proper reference probably would have been to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. That is it. Is not that exactly the case? If the House had wanted a committee of seven raised, it would have referred it to the Committee on Rules, where ordinarily it would have gone.

Mr. MANN. As a matter of fact, that would not be the case, because, as a matter of fact, the gentleman who moved to refer it afterwards came to me and suggested that it go to the Committee on Rules. I told him I did not care where it went.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair had referred it, he would have sent it to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MANN. But the Chair could not send it to any committee. The House could have sent it to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service or to the committee on expenditures in the back yard. The House could send it wherever it pleased, but what the House sent to the committee to determine was whether a select committee should or should not be appointed.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I think that these resolutions are responsive to the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois. If the Chair will read the last two lines of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois, he will find that it reads:

To the end that it may be ascertained whether the Members of this House, constituting in part the lawmaking branch of the Government, are above the law.

The committee to which it was referred, in place of a special committee, have reported to the House their opinion in response to the resolution that they are not above the law, because they have not violated the law and have submitted to the House the resolutions which are reported in response to the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, in the form of a report that they have violated no law, and therefore in full response to the original resolution.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, just one word, and not because I think I can throw any light on the parliamentary situation. Briefly, I want to say that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, after a long preamble, provided for the appointment of a committee to investigate and report if the membership of this House was not guilty of acts in violation of a section of the statute referred to by him. The action of the committee reports back to the House a resolution which seems to me, if I know the meaning of the word, is absolutely germane to this resolution. The burden of the resolution was to investigate and report to the House the result of it, advising the House if Members have violated this section of the statute, and to report if Members of Congress, one branch of the lawmaking body, is above the law and not amenable to it. After a careful consideration we have invited by this resolution a discussion of the question, Are Members of Congress felons in doing the things referred to in the original resolution? The gentleman from Illinois, to my surprise, reads a whole volume of precedents for the purpose of seeking further delay. It seems to me he would rather insist on action on his resolution.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make this suggestion: The committee that was sought to be appointed by the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois was a committee of investigation. The question whether that committee should be appointed or not was referred to one of the standing committees of this House. The standing committee of the House could have reported unfavorably on that resolution. They did try to report unfavorably, but instead of putting that matter in their report they put it in a resolution, and, strange to say, we have this anomaly that this committee now reports to the House favorably on the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois with an amendment.

The question must be considered by the Chair, whether that amendment is or is not germane to the original resolution. Certainly it could not be held that it is germane merely because it is of the same subject matter, because the one is for the appointment of a committee to determine a personal question as to whether or not any Member of this House had or not violated the law. That could have been determined, and the committee could have said "No," and it could have stated reasons. But that is not what they did. They reported this resolution favorably with an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. In a moment. That amendment is what? Not any modification, not any change of the resolution, but merely an exposition of the law as the committee understood it; in other words, their reasons why they would have reported unfavorably and their suggestion as to what the meaning of the statute is. It looks to me as if there could be no question but that the exposition of the law—and, in fact, I remember that repeatedly it has been held that an exposition of the law is not germane to the law itself, and that is what this is, and nothing else. Now I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where does the gentleman find the recommendation that this resolution be favorably reported?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman stated the resolution had been favorably reported by the committee.

Mr. TOWNER. I say that in effect.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman did not say it in effect. He twice stated positively that this resolution had been favorably reported by the committee.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where is there any such statement in the report of the committee? A favorable recommendation is that the resolution be adopted. There is no such recommendation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not read the report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I have it right before me:

In accordance with the facts herein reported and the conclusions herein expressed, your committee reports back to the House the resolution H. Res. 256 with recommendations that the House adopt, as a substitute therefor, the following resolutions.

Mr. MANN. Certainly. That is reporting favorably with a recommendation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, that is not a favorable recommendation. Nobody would dream of construing it to be such.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman used to be a good parliamentarian, but he has been in the House so little lately that he has lost his knowledge. He knows, however, that a resolution goes by its number.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I had remained to listen to such arguments as that, I would lose any knowledge I ever had. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, there can be no such substitution of a resolution for the original resolution; that is not a favorable report. Of course, everybody understands that the committee did not intend to report favorably on the resolution, and what they ought to have done was to bring in an unfavorable report against the resolution, stating their reasons for so doing, which they have included in the resolution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. The resolution that the committee did report is the exact opposite of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois, is it not?

Mr. TOWNER. That is one of the proofs, is it not, that it can not possibly be germane to the original resolution?

Mr. HARDWICK. Not at all.

Mr. TOWNER. I am only arguing these circumstances to show that it can not possibly be germane.

Mr. MANN. It will not need instructions on this side of the House to know that to report favorably a bill does not mean that every one of its provisions must be reported favorably, though the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] seem to assume that. What a committee reports is the number of the bill. In this case they report the number of the resolution with a recommendation changing the entire matter, but they report the resolution favorably, or else it would have been laid upon the table by this time.

Mr. HARDWICK. After changing the sense of it from what the gentleman offered.

Mr. MANN. We thought everybody understood that without explanation. We will get a chart for the benefit of those two gentlemen and explain that the committee were afraid of an investigation, and hence opposed it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] contained a preamble which recites that certain acts are prohibited by section 118 of the penal laws and that section 119 prohibits certain other acts. It then recites that it is alleged that certain Members of Congress performed certain acts, from which it is inferred that the statute was violated, and upon these allegations the gentleman's resolution to create a special committee was predicated. The special committee was to investigate and report whether any Members of the House were guilty of violating the two sections of the Penal Code mentioned, and the acts upon which the report would be made were recited in the preamble of the resolution. The committee, it appears, sets forth in its report that certain acts mentioned had been done by certain persons, and then states the practice of Members of Congress relative to solicitation of campaign funds from other Members of Congress, and set out the conclusion that it is not a violation of either section of the Penal Code to do the things recited in the preamble of the gentleman's resolution as a basis for the creation of a special committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, while I am thoroughly convinced that the point of order is good, I am quite content that the majority side of the House should stultify itself on a matter of this sort if it wishes, and I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thought that would be the effect of my remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, I did it in spite of the gentleman's argument, which I could not hear, but knew was unsound.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the ranking member of the committee, Mr. AINEY, on the floor, but I would like to know if we can agree on some length of time for debate?

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RUCKER. I will let the gentleman fix it, if he does not fix it too short.

Mr. MANN. I do not think much time will be taken.

Mr. RUCKER. Does the gentleman desire to debate it at all?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I want to say a few words on the subject.

Mr. RUCKER. About how much time would the gentleman like to have?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether anybody else desires to be heard or not. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RUCKER. I would like to know about how many gentlemen desire to discuss it, if they want to discuss it at all. How many minutes does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MANN. I have not suggested any. Let the gentleman proceed. I think there will be no protracted debate.

Mr. RUCKER. I will consume very little time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has an hour under his control.

Mr RUCKER. Does the gentleman want to fix the time at 30 minutes on the side?

Mr. MANN. I think we may be able to finish it sooner than that.

Mr. RUCKER. Of course I want to close the debate upon the question.

Mr. MANN. The other substitute resolutions were not read.

Mr. RUCKER. No.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the substitute resolutions be treated as one amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that both of these resolutions be treated as one. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. I desire to close debate. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois such time as he may desire.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the second resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is no violation of section 119 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit contributions for political purposes, from other Senators or Members of the House, by letters written in his office in the Senate or House Office Buildings.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RUCKER. I yield the gentleman from Illinois such time of 30 minutes as he may desire.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on September 15, 1913, or under that date, a letter was sent out to the Democratic Members of Congress, both of the House and Senate, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 15, 1913.

At a meeting of the Democratic national congressional committee, August 28, 1913, the following resolution, presented by Senator THOMAS, of Colorado, was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That an assessment of $100 be made on each Democratic Member of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate, to be paid to the chairman of the congressional committee, as follows: Twenty-five dollars at once; $25 on or before January 1, 1914; balance on or before July 1, 1914."

The committee is in debt to the extent of nearly $4,000 and has no money in the treasury. The object of the foregoing resolution is to secure funds with which to pay the debts of the committee and begin the work of the approaching campaign.

Checks should be made payable to Hon. WILLIAM G. SHARP, treasurer, and handed to ———, member of the committee from your State, who will make return thereof to the treasurer. The entire amount may be paid at once or in installments provided by the resolution.

Trusting that you will favor the committee with an early payment, I beg to remain,

Very sincerely, yours, FRANK E. DOREMUS, Chairman.

That letter was signed by FRANK E. DOREMUS, chairman of that committee, and in this connection and before I pass on, I desire to say a good word for the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], whether he has unintentionally violated the law or not. I have watched Mr. DOREMUS in this House, and joined with him on several notable fights, especially in connection with the tolls question on the Panama Canal, and I entertain for him not only the highest official and personal regard, but also a very affectionate regard. I would not do anything here or elsewhere which I thought would really embarrass him, but when this letter came out I called it to the attention of the House, and have since learned with surprise that this violation of the law was a regular thing for the Democratic congressional committee, and have since been informed that even our Progressive reformers have followed in the same course; and I have served for a time on the executive committee of the Republican congressional committee and knew, so far as I knew anything about the management of that committee, which was not very great, that it was not considered lawful for that committee to solicit subscriptions of Members of Congress, and I read the law. This is section 118 of the Penal Code, which is taken, I think, word for word from the old civil-service law, and really sounds better when you speak of it as a section of the civil-service law than a section of the Penal Code when you are talking about Members of Congress in connection with it. That law is as follows:

SEC. 118. No Senator or Representative in or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to Congress, or Senator, Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner elect, or officer or employee of either House of Congress, and no executive, judicial, military, or naval officer of the United States, and no clerk or employee of any department, branch, or bureau of the executive, judicial, or military or naval service of the United States, shall, directly or indirectly, solicit or receive, or be in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving, any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever, from any officer, clerk, or employee of the United States, or any department, branch, or bureau thereof, or from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States.

Now, Members of Congress are not officials or officers of the Government, but they are persons receiving their salaries from the Treasury of the United States; and here is an express inhibition against Members of Congress receiving from each other contributions for political purposes. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], who makes the report on this case, admits this proposition so far as the letter of the law is concerned. In his report he says:

It will be conceded that the letter of section 118 would prohibit one Senator or Member of Congress from soliciting or receiving campaign contributions from another Senator or Member of Congress. But that is not the end of the matter.

Here is an express admission that the letter of the law forbids the transaction which I have referred to, the action of the Democratic national committee; that the letter of the law makes this a penal offense. Then follows a series of reasonings so fantastical that they could only emanate from a mind filled with the imagery of brilliant thoughts. A Member of Congress is above the letter of the law. That is what I asked in my original resolution, to the end that it may be ascertained whether the Members of this House, constituting in part the law-making branch of the Government, are above the law. The distinguished committee, or the Democratic members of it, find that Members of Congress are above the law. They admit that the letter of the law includes Members of Congress; but we are so great, we are so mighty, we are so important, that the law does not touch us, in the opinion of this committee. Now, I have been taught to believe that of all the people who ought to carefully observe the law it is the ones who make the law. Members of Congress who make the law are the ones first who ought to observe the law, and because we are Members of Congress, because we are not officers of the Government, because we are unclassified in the description of governmental employees, this distinguished committee finds that Members of Congress, though covered by the letter of the law, are above the law and not covered by the spirit of the law. And here is one of the reasonings which is given:

In the present case the title of the act—

That was the old civil-service act where this provision first appeared—

"An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States" indicates quite clearly that Congress was not legislating for the benefit or protection of its own membership, since the phrase "the civil service of the United States" has always been understood as comprising principally persons holding office or employment by appointment in the executive departments of the Government.

Now, I may be mistaken, but I have always thought that the civil service of a government was a term used in contradistinction to the military service of the government, and that in our Government everything that is not connected with the Army or the Navy under the Government was the civil service side of the Government; but according to this learned committee, nothing is under the civil service unless it is a matter of appointment in the executive departments of the Government. I suppose my good friend from Missouri would think that this civil-service law, passed under that title, now carried in the Penal Code, would permit the Democratic national committee to solicit and receive subscriptions from Army and Navy officers on the grounds that they are not connected with the civil-service end of the Government. The main argument that is made is that the civil-service act is to be construed by the title, which refers only to the civil service of the Government, and hence can not do anything to forbid anyone not in the civil service of the Government from making contributions. He reasons that Members of Congress are not in the civil service of the Government, and hence may make these political contributions to each other; but who will claim that the military branch of the Government can make political contributions under this law, which forbids anyone receiving salaries or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury making contributions, or anyone to receive contributions from such persons.

Mr. Speaker, it is palpable that a great Democratic majority can pass any kind of a resolution it wants and exempt itself from violation of the law. Of course, they can not determine the construction of the law which would be binding on anyone. If they wanted a construction of the law, the courts are to construe it; but the Democratic side of the House having been found violating the law, with the goods in their possession, admitting that they were violating the law or doing the acts which the letter of the law says is a violation, now proposes to administer to itself a dose of whitewash. It is a travesty upon legislative procedure. It will not redound to their credit in the country. They violated the law, a law passed to uphold the benefits of the country to the people and to prevent the legging and begging for political contributions from persons in the employ of the Government, and soon, if the Democratic majority were to continue in this House long, which, thank God, it has not a chance to do [applause on the Republican side], soon gentlemen who now come to Congress from districts where they do not live, because sometimes in the past, at least, they have been liberal contributors to campaign funds, will be seeking election to Congress at the suggestion of Democratic congressional committees in order that they may make fat contributions here and receive committee assignments in pay for them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Here is your proposition: You think that the only purpose of the law was to prevent poor clerks from contributing to campaign funds. I would rather let the clerks have the right to contribute and take the chances on their demoralizing the public service than to permit Members of this House, because they are rich, because they can contribute freely, to buy their places through a caucus control of committees. Idle nonsense? Not at all. That is what will happen. Under this construction of the law it will be impossible, if Members of Congress have the right to contribute to their campaign funds—and it is understood that is to be the method of raising money—to prevent the rich men who come to Congress from tendering campaign contributions and exacting in return favors in the House. I am against the whole thing. I am willing to finance my campaign in my district, but I am unwilling to help finance the campaign of some other Member in his district. I am unwilling to be placed where a rich Member of Congress can tender me his contribution to help me in my district, expecting rewards in return. You can do it if you want to do so, but it is corruption of the worst kind. Thank God, you will not stay long. Good-by! [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, let me say in the very beginning that I have never questioned the right of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to introduce the resolution which gives rise to this discussion. In introducing the resolution (H. Res. 256) he was quite within his rights as a Member of the House. I have not said, and shall not to-day say, one word that will even look like a criticism of his exercise of that right. I want to say, too, because sometimes what one says in debate is misunderstood, that I have for the gentleman a profound regard. I regard him as one of the most efficient Members of this House, and if he were a Democrat I would probably regard him the most efficient Member in the House. I have regard for his legal learning, and admiration for his tireless, unceasing energy. Until very recently, since this matter came up, I was becoming alarmed at the amount of affection I bore for him. I still respect him, but have lost some of the affection I used to have for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, if I correctly caught the language used by the gentleman in this debate, he admitted that Members of Congress are not officials or officers of the Government, and no one contends that they are employees. In admitting this he clearly admits himself out of court so far as the resolution relates to section 119 of the Criminal Code. And yet the gentleman deliberately wrote into the preamble to his resolution the suggestion, if not charge, that Members of Congress were violating the provisions of section 119. This section prohibits any person from soliciting or receiving political contributions "in any room or building occupied in the discharge of official duties by any officer or employee of the United States mentioned in the preceding section." Members of Congress are not employees, and if they are not officials or officers of the Government, and the gentleman admits they are not, then surely it is no violation of the provisions of section 119 to either solicit or receive contributions for political purposes in a Member's office.

No gentleman who signed the minority views—no gentleman in this House will assert the proposition that the writing of the letter quoted in this resolution in a Member's office was or is a criminal act. This is all I desire to say upon this feature of this controversy at this time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly. With great pleasure.

Mr. MANN. I have not quite gotten through my head the point the gentleman makes.

Mr. RUCKER. I will try to make myself clear to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I am asking for information. I did not quite get the point the gentleman is trying to make in regard to section 119.

Mr. RUCKER. Here is the point. I will read the section again, even at the hazard of losing valuable time.

Mr. MANN. I know what the section is.

Mr. RUCKER. You know what it is. Then I will not read it, but will repeat that if Members of Congress are not officers or employees, then obviously section 119 could not and does not refer to a Member's office.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. RUCKER. Because this section expressly refers to the room or building occupied in the discharge of official duties by the officers and employees mentioned in the previous section and to no other room or building.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman claim that there are no employees of the United States employed in the House Office Building or the Capitol Building?

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman understands I am not claiming that, but the question now asked does not bear on the issue raised by his resolution.

Mr. MANN. I did not understand you, then.

Mr. RUCKER. Upon reflection I hope the gentleman will be able to understand me.

Mr. MANN. I was asking the question seriously of the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER. I am trying to answer you seriously. With reference to the last clause of section 118, which reads, "or from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States," it is true, it is admitted in the committee's report, that the letter of this clause prohibits one Senator or Member from soliciting or receiving contributions for political purposes from other Senators and Members.

It is upon this clause in the statute and this frank admission in the report that the gentleman based his entire argument. If the language just read from the statute, the closing clause of section 118, was all the language defining those from whom contributions should not be solicited or received, this proceeding would not now command the attention of the House. The gentleman's argument confesses the weakness of the cause, because he, as a good lawyer, knows, and knows well, that to get the true meaning of the law the whole section must be read. Those whom the law, as written in section 118, protects from solicitation or payment of contributions for political purposes are defined and classified as—from any officer, clerk, or employee of the United States, or any department, branch, or bureau thereof, or from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States.

It is in connection with the last clause that the gentleman's resolution charges that Members of Congress are guilty of criminal practices. Your committee denies the charge. We insist that the courts, from the highest to the lowest judicial tribunals in the United States, have established well-recognized rules by which statutes like this must be construed. The leading case is that of Holy Trinity Church v. United States (143 U. S., 457), and there the Supreme Court fully discussed and decided every principle involved here. Every contention made by your committee finds unqualified support in this case as well as in many other authorities cited in its report.

I will not read at length from this case as your committee made liberal quotations from it in its report, which I hope all Members have carefully read.

Permit me to say, in few words, the case to which I have just referred was a prosecution for an alleged violation of the alien contract-labor law, which made it a crime for anyone to contract in advance with any alien to come to the United States "to perform labor or service of any kind." The Holy Trinity Church, a corporation, had contracted with one Warren, a foreigner, to come to New York and enter its service as rector and pastor. After conviction in the lower court the defendant took the case to the Supreme Court. In determining the case the Supreme Court of the United States said: "It must be conceded that the act of the corporation is within the letter" of the law, but reversed the lower court and discharged the defendant, because the act complained of, though "within the letter of the statute, was not within the statute, because not within its spirit, not within the intention of its makers."

In this connection, let me say, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made his entire speech on the admission in the report that "it will be conceded that the letter of section 118," if the statute is construed strictly by its letter, would apply to Senators and Members. If the Supreme Court of the United States can "concede" that a given act may be within the "letter" of the law and yet not be within the law, can not your committee do the same? Will any Member of this House be influenced by such argument as the gentleman made? Why, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had this committee report in his hands nearly one week and of course he studied it. In it he found every principle of law upon which your committee relies; he found every authority cited; he saw, read, and considered every conclusion we reached. He challenges the application of no legal principle; he criticizes no authority; he controverts the accuracy of no conclusion. By his action he admits the force and legality of every contention we make. Does any thoughtful man believe, or will any such person ever believe, that the Congress intended the general words "or from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States" to apply to all who come within the "letter" of these words? The man who is employed by a contractor on any work being done for the Government comes with the "letter" of the law. The owner of a building rented to the Government is within the "letter," the pensioner is within the "letter," but who will be bold enough or, more correctly, who will be reckless enough with his opinion to say it was the intention of Congress to include them? If not to them, then by what process of reasoning can it be said to apply to Senators and Members?

I challenge the gentleman to find one word in the extended and prolonged debate on this section which in any remote degree suggests that any man intended the language under consideration to include Members of Congress and Senators. If he will take the language of Senator Logan, of his own State; the language of Senator Harrison, of Senator Maxey, of Senator Beck, of Senator Hawley, who offered these sections as an amendment to the civil-service bill, and of all the Senators who discussed it, he will be forced to admit that this amendment was not intended to apply and had no reference whatever to contributions or collections made by Senators or Members of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to read an extract?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly. What page are you going to read from?

Mr. MANN. Page 6 of the first report, at the bottom of the page. Senator Hoar said:

I think all, or nearly all, of us felt sure that the public expression of condemnation of that circular was such that the practice of appealing to officials by a committee of either or both branches of Congress would never be heard of again.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. I believe we are officials.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, read it all. It has reference to the humble official—the humble employees—not to Senators and Members, as the gentleman will clearly see if he will read a little further on the same page from what Senator Hoar said. I will read for his benefit what Senator Hoar said in that same connection:

It is an entirely indelicate and improper relation for Senators or Members of the House of Representatives to be asking contributions, voluntary or involuntary, of persons in the civil service of the Government.

Does that afford the gentleman any comfort or strengthen his argument?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. FESS. I am trying to construe this section 118, and I want to read a sentence and ask the distinguished Member whether I read it correctly or not. I read:

SEC. 118. No Senator or Representative * * * shall, directly or indirectly, solicit or receive, or be in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving, any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever, from * * * any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States.

Does not that take me in?

Mr. RUCKER. As you read it, yes; but you did not read it all. I grant you that if what you read was the only language, then it would take you in.

Mr. FESS. But if I were parsing this, for the construction of subject and predicate, I have certainly read it according to the interpretation.

Mr. RUCKER. But if you were construing it according to the well-recognized rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States you would have to construe the general words you have read to have reference to the class of persons previously particularly mentioned in that section.

Mr. FESS. Why were the words "from any person" put in there?

Mr. RUCKER. I can not answer that, except in this way: The gentleman well knows there are a great many employees of the Government who are not referred to as officers or employees. We have the charwomen, the Capitol police, the messengers, the doorkeepers, and a thousand other officers and employees, as you well know, who are not usually considered or referred to as officers or employees.

Mr. FESS. Why would not "employees of the United States" cover all of those?

Mr. RUCKER. It would in a general way.

Mr. FESS. Those words are in here.

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; I know they are.

Mr. FESS. Then why was the explanatory phrase necessary, if they are all included under "employees of the United States"?

Mr. RUCKER. Why were the particular words used if the broad language in the phrase referred to was intended by Congress to embrace all who would come within the "letter" of that phrase?

I quote from a recognized textbook:

By the rule of construction known as "ejusdem generis," where general words follow the enumeration of particular classes of persons or things, the general words will be construed as applicable only to persons or things of the same general nature or class as those enumerated. The particular words are presumed to describe certain species and the general words to be used for the purpose of including other species of the same genus. The rule is based on the obvious reason that if the legislature had intended the general words to be used in their unrestricted sense they would have made no mention of the particular classes.

Mr. FESS. Where the letter of the law is clear, does the court take into consideration the spirit of the law? Suppose the letter of the law is one thing, and the spirit is in contradiction of that, will the court not hold by the letter rather than the spirit?

Mr. RUCKER. That is, if there is no ambiguity?

Mr. FESS. If there is no ambiguity in the letter of the law?

Mr. RUCKER. Where there is no ambiguity in the law, unquestionably the law as it is written will govern; but will anybody say there is not in this language some ambiguity? Will anybody question for one moment that when the Congress of the United States, acting on the recommendation of President Arthur, in attempting to cure and provide against the recurrence of an evil that had existed in our country for many years, namely, the assessment of these various little officeholders for political purposes, that it intended that these general words should be read and construed in their unrestricted sense?

Mr. FESS. But the law that I refer to is the law of March 4, 1909.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, it was 1883 when this law was enacted.

Mr. FESS. That is the civil-service law.

Mr. RUCKER. This is the civil-service law—taken bodily from the civil-service law.

Mr. FESS. This is the corrupt-practices act of March 4, 1909.

Mr. RUCKER. With due deference to the gentleman, I fail to see the relevancy of his inquiry.

Let me suggest to the gentleman if the Congress of the United States had intended that nobody who draws compensation or salary from the United States should contribute to campaign funds, then why specify officers, employers, or clerks or anybody else? Why not use broad language alone and avoid any possible confusion?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman's contention is that if the Congress meant to convey that idea it would have said "no person"?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; it would have used that language alone. It would have simply written in the law that no Senator, Representative, or clerk, and so forth, shall solicit or receive campaign contributions from "any person who receives any salary or compensation" from the United States, and that would have ended it, because then it would have applied to every person who draws such salary.

I desire to call attention to another case which will aid in construing the statute under consideration. In the case of the United States against Bevans the indictment was for murder committed on a ship in Boston Harbor. The act of Congress provided:

That if any person or persons shall within any fort, arsenal, dockyard, magazine, or in any other place or district or country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, commit the crime of willful murder, such person or persons being thereof convicted shall suffer death.

The indictment charged the killing on a ship in a harbor. It was contended by the United States that the ship was a "place" within its sole and exclusive jurisdiction within the meaning of that statute, but Chief Justice Marshall in deciding the case said:

The objects with which the word "place" is associated are all in their nature fixed and territorial. A fort, an arsenal, a dockyard, a magazine are all of this character. When the sentence proceeds with the words "or in any other place or district or country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States," the construction seems irresistible that by the words "other place" was intended another place of a similar character with those previously enumerated and with that which follows.

Then, again, another case, which I think furnishes strong support of my contention, is a North Dakota case. There a dealer ordered a case of beer from another State. The vendor accepted the order and shipped the beer under an agreement with the railroad that it would not deliver the goods to the dealer until he produced the bill of lading which the vendor attached to a sight draft for the price of the beer and sent to a bank in North Dakota for collection. The collecting bank was indicted under section 239 of the Criminal Code of the United States, which provides that "any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or any other person," who, in connection with interstate shipments of liquors, shall collect the purchase price, and so forth, shall be fined, and so forth. In reversing the judgment of the lower court the court said:

To our minds the natural and manifest meaning of the declaration in this law that "any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or any other person who, in connection with the transportation," etc., shall collect the purchase price or act as the agent of the buyer or seller, shall be fined, excludes banks, ordinary collectors, and all persons who are not members of the general class of carriers.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. For a brief question.

Mr. SLOAN. May I ask if there are any others exempt under this, except Representatives and Senators?

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, I think so. I think the President of the United States would be exempt. Does not the gentleman?

Mr. SLOAN. I thought perhaps so.

Mr. RUCKER. What is the gentleman's judgment about it?

Mr. SLOAN. I am inclined to think that that is probably correct, but I wanted to observe that it ought to be clear what we are doing.

Mr. RUCKER. I think the President and the Secretary of State and other Cabinet officers would be exempt, although as to that I prefer not at present to express a decided opinion, because my investigation has been confined to the membership of the House and the other body of Congress.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think it has been held in extradition proceedings that a man who represented himself as a Member of Congress was violating the act that prohibited a man representing himself as an officer of the United States. That decision held that a Congressman was an officer of the United States.

Mr. RUCKER. I have not examined a case where it was so held.

Mr. KAHN. That is the Lamar case, which case is on appeal now in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, we can speak more accurately after the Supreme Court has disposed of it. As my time has expired, I must close, but will here insert the report of the committee in continuation of my argument:

[House Report No. 677, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES.

Mr. RUCKER, from the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, submitted the following report, to accompany H. Res. 256:

The Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, to which was referred, by order of the House, the resolution (H. Res. 256) entitled "Resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate and report whether any Members have been guilty of violating the provisions of the Criminal Code by soliciting contributions for political purposes, etc.," having had the same under consideration, respectfully submits to the House the facts ascertained and its conclusion thereon.

The resolution under consideration is as follows:

"Whereas the act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States approved March 4, 1909, provides in section 118 that no Senator or Representative shall directly or indirectly solicit or receive or be in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States; and

"Whereas it is provided in section 119 of said act that no person shall in any room or building occupied in the discharge of official duties by any officer or employee of the United States mentioned in the preceding section solicit in any manner whatever or receive any contribution of money or other thing of value for any political purpose whatever; and

"Whereas it is alleged that the Democratic national congressional committee, composed in chief part of Members of this House, has directed to be sent, and it is alleged there has been sent, to the Democratic Members of this House a letter stating that an assessment has been levied upon the Democratic Members of this House, soliciting contributions from such Members for political purposes, and it is alleged that said letter has been signed by a Member of this House and delivered to other Members of this House in the Capitol Building and in the House Office Building, which letter is alleged to read as follows:

"SEPTEMBER 15, 1913.

"At a meeting of the Democratic national congressional committee, August 28, 1913, the following resolution presented by Senator THOMAS, of Colorado, was unanimously adopted:

"'Resolved, That an assessment of $100 be made on each Democratic Member of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate, to be paid to the chairman of the congressional committee, as follows: $25 at once; $25 on or before January 1, 1914; balance on or before July 1, 1914.'

"The committee is in debt to the extent of nearly $4,000 and has no money in the treasury. The object of the foregoing resolution is to secure funds with which to pay the debts of the committee and begin the work of the approaching campaign:

"Checks should be made payable to Hon. WILLIAM G. SHARP, treasurer, and handed to ———, a member of the committee from your State, who will make return thereof to the treasurer. The entire amount may be paid at once or in installments provided by the resolution.

"Trusting that you will favor the committee with an early payment, I beg to remain,

"Very sincerely, yours,

"FRANK E. DOREMUS, Chairman.

"And

"Whereas section 122 of said act provides that whoever shall violate any provision of section 118 or section 119 shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both; Therefore be it

"Resolved, That a committee of seven members shall be appointed by the Speaker to investigate and report to this House whether any Members of this House have been guilty of violating any of the provisions of the Criminal Code by soliciting or receiving or by being in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States, and particularly from Members of this House, to the end that it may be ascertained whether the Members of this House, constituting in part the lawmaking branch of the Government, are above the law."

In the discharge of the duties imposed upon the committee hearings were had on the resolution above quoted, and the testimony of officers of the national congressional committees of the various political parties, and of other persons, was obtained and considered. It is perfectly clear from the testimony of those identified with the Democratic national congressional committee during the last 8 or 10 years that it has been the uniform usage, custom, and practice of that committee, through its appropriate officers, to solicit and receive contributions for political purposes from Senators of the United States and Representatives in Congress of the Democratic Party.

The testimony of Mr. DOREMUS, present chairman of the Democratic national congressional committee, discloses, without the least effort at concealment, that, since he became chairman, contributions for political purposes have been solicited from Senators and Representatives of his political party, through letters bearing his signature; that letters similar to the letter quoted in the resolution under consideration were mailed to Senators and Representatives with his knowledge and consent; that said letters were prepared in the office assigned to him in the House Office Building, as a Representative in Congress; but that neither he nor anyone acting for him has solicited or received any contribution from any officer, clerk, or employee of the United States mentioned in the sections of the Criminal Code referred to in said resolution.

The testimony of the present chairman of the Republican national congressional committee, Hon. FRANK P. WOODS, makes it clear that since he became chairman it has not been the usage, custom, or practice of that committee to solicit or receive contributions from Senators or Representatives of his political party; that he has no knowledge that said committee has at any time solicited or received contributions for political purposes from Senators or Representatives in Congress.

Mr. John C. Eversman, who, for many years past, has been associated with the Republican national congressional committee, has no recollection of solicitations being made of or contributions being received from Senators or Representatives, except that he remembers, on one occasion, Hon. William McKinley, a distinguished ex-Member of this House and a former chairman of said committee, made a contribution.

Hon. Wm. H. Hinebaugh, chairman of the national congressional committee of the Progressive Party, testified, with frankness and candor, that on the occasion when the members of the Progressive Party organized their national congressional committee each member present, as he remembers, contributed to a fund to be used under the direction of that committee for political purposes.

The hearing, summarized, shows that the national congressional committees are in the main composed of Senators and Representatives in Congress; that the Democratic national congressional committee has for many years been in the habit of soliciting and receiving contributions from Senators and Members; that its actions were open to view; were generally known and each contribution reported as required by the national publicity law since its enactment; that if such committee of the Republican Party solicited or received contributions from Senators or Members in the past for political purposes, the witness who appeared before this committee and testified to his long connection with the Republican congressional committee has no recollection of the fact, except so far as relates to one contribution by an ex-Member of this House; that the committee of the Progressive Party frankly and without hesitation or effort at concealment admits that it has received contributions from Members of Congress of that political party to be used for political purposes.

The questions involved in the consideration of this resolution (H. Res. 256) are largely questions of law. There is no controversy as to the facts; when carefully considered there should be no controversy as to the law.

Sections which are now 118, 119, 120, and 121 of the Criminal Code were added by way of amendment to the civil-service act, as reported by the committee to the Senate in 1883, and, as they all bear upon the same question, should be considered together in determining the questions herein involved

They are as follows:

"SEC. 118. No Senator or Representative in or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to Congress, or Senator, Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner elect, or officer or employee of either House of Congress, and no executive, judicial, military, or naval officer of the United States, and no clerk or employee of any department, branch, or bureau of the executive, judicial, or military or naval service of the United States, shall, directly or indirectly, solicit or receive, or be in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving, any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever, from any officer, clerk, or employee of the United States, or any department, branch or bureau thereof, or from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States.

"SEC. 119. No person shall, in any room or building occupied in the discharge of official duties by any officer or employee of the United States mentioned in the preceding section, or in any navy yard, fort, or arsenal, solicit in any manner whatever or receive any contribution of money or other thing of value for any political purpose whatever.

"SEC. 120. No officer or employee of the United States mentioned in section 118 shall discharge, or promote, or degrade, or in any manner change the official rank or compensation of any other officer or employee, or promise or threaten so to do, for giving or withholding or neglecting to make any contribution of money or other valuable thing for any political purpose.

"SEC. 121. No officer, clerk, or other person in the service of the United States shall, directly or indirectly, give or hand over to any other officer, clerk, or person in the service of the United States, or to any Senator or Member of or Delegate to Congress, or Resident Commissioner, any money or other valuable thing on account of or to be applied to the promotion of any political object whatever."

The above sections of the Criminal Code were taken without substantial change from "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," approved January 16, 1883 (22 Stat., 403).

It will be conceded that the letter of section 118 would prohibit one Senator or Member of Congress from soliciting or receiving campaign contributions from another Senator or Member of Congress. But that is not the end of the matter. If to give the statute that effect would be manifestly contrary to the intention of Congress, the letter must yield. This, of course, is elementary.

The leading case is Holy Trinity Church v. United States (143 U. S., 457). There the Supreme Court, overruling the circuit court of appeals, held that a contract whereby an alien engaged to remove to the United States and to enter into the service of a religious society as its rector or minister, although clearly within the letter of the alien contract labor law, was not a violation thereof, because it was plainly not the intention of Congress by that law to prohibit such contracts. We quote from the opinion in the above cited case as follows:

"Plaintiff in error is a corporation, duly organized and incorporated as a religious society under the laws of the State of New York. E. Walpole Warren was, prior to September, 1887, an alien, residing in England. In that month the plaintiff in error made a contract with him, by which he was to remove to the city of New York and enter into its service as rector and pastor; and in pursuance of such contract, Warren did so remove and enter upon such service. It is claimed by the United States that this contract on the part of the plaintiff in error was forbidden by the act of February 26, 1885 (23 Stat., 332, ch. 164), and an action was commenced to recover the penalty prescribed by that act. The circuit court held that the contract was within the prohibition of the statute, and rendered judgment accordingly (36 Fed. Rep., 303), and the single question presented for our determination is whether it erred in that conclusion.

"The first section describes the act forbidden, and is in these words:

"'Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any person, company, partnership, or corporation, in any manner whatsoever, to prepay the transportation, or in any way assist or encourage the importation or migration of any alien or aliens, any foreigner or foreigners, into the United States, its Territories, or the District of Columbia, under contract or agreement, parol or special, express or implied, made previous to the importation or migration of such alien or aliens, foreigner or foreigners, to perform labor or service of any kind in the United States, its Territories, or the District of Columbia.'

"It must be conceded that the act of the corporation is within the letter of this section, for the relation of rector to his church is one of service, and implies labor on the one side with compensation on the other. Not only are the general words labor and service both used, but also, as it were to guard against any narrow interpretation and emphasize a breadth of meaning, to them is added 'of any kind'; and, further, as noticed by the circuit judge in his opinion, the fifth section which makes specific exceptions, among them professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, and domestic servants, strengthens the idea that every other kind of labor and service was intended to be reached by the first section. While there is great force to this reasoning, we can not think Congress intended to denounce with penalties a transaction like that in the present case. It is a familiar rule that a thing may be within the letter of the statute and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirit, nor within the intention of its makers. This has been often asserted, and the reports are full of cases illustrating its applications. This is not the substitution of the will of the judge for that of the legislator, for frequently words of general meaning are used in a statute, words broad enough to include an act in question, and yet a consideration of the whole legislation, or of the circumstances surrounding its enactment, or of the absurd results which follow from giving such broad meaning to the words, makes it unreasonable to believe that the legislator intended to include the particular act.

In the same case the court said:

"Among other things which may be considered in determining the intent of the legislature is the title of the act. We do not mean that it may be used to add to or take from the body of the statute (Hadden v. The Collector, 5 Wall., 107), but it may help to interpret its meaning."

In its opinion in State v Clark, 5 Dutcher (29 N. J. Law), 96–99, quoted with approval in Trinity Church v. U. S., the court said:

"The language of the act, if construed literally, evidently leads to an absurd result. If a literal construction of the words of a statute be absurd, the act must be so construed as to avoid the absurdity. The court must restrain the words. The object designed to be reached by the act must limit and control the literal import of the terms and phrases employed."

In United States v. Kirby (7 Wall., 482–486), quoted and approved in Trinity Church v. U. S., the court said:

"All laws should receive a sensible construction. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice, oppression, or an absurd consequence. It will always, therefore, be presumed that the legislature intended exceptions to its language which would avoid results of this character. The reason of the law in such cases should prevail over its letter."

In U. S. v. Freeman (3 Howard, 1 ch., 564), the court, quoting from Wimbish v. Tailbois (Plowd., 57), said:

"Wherever any words of a staute are doubtful or obscure, the intention of the legislature is to be resorted to, in order to find the meaning of the words. A thing which is within the intention of the makers of the statute is as much within the statute as if it were within the letter."

In the same case the court quotes from 4 Dall., 14.

"The intention of the legislature, when discovered, must prevail, any rule of construction declared by previous acts to the contrary notwithstanding."

And from 2 Cranch, 33—

"A law is the best expositor of itself—that every part of an act is to be taken into view for the purpose of discovering the mind of the legislature."

Applying this principle again in a later case under the same act, the Supreme Court held that a contract made with an alien in a foreign country to come to this country as a chemist on a sugar plantation in Louisiana was not a contract "to perform labor or service of any kind" within the intendment of Congress. (United States v. Laws, 163 U. S., 258.)

For later statements and applications of the principle by the Supreme Court see Treat v. White (181 U. S., 264, 267); Hawaii v. Mankechi (190 U. S., 197, 212, 213); Pickett v. United States (216 U. S., 456, 461); American Security Company v. District of Columbia (224 U. S., 491, 495). In the last-named case the court said (p. 495):

"A well-known example of construing a statute not to include a case that indisputably was within its literal meaning, but was believed not to be within the aim of Congress is Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States (143 U. S., 457)." * * *

Obviously the principle is one to be applied with the utmost circumspection. As observed in United States v. Goldenberg (168 U. S., 95, 103), by Mr. Justice Brewer, who stated the principle so forcefully in the case of the Church of the Holy Trinity, the cases for its application "are few and exceptional, and only arise when there are cogent reasons for believing that the letter does not fully and accurately disclose the intent."

For the purpose of showing in a given case that the letter of an act of Congress is plainly contrary to the intent of Congress, reference may be had to the title of the act, the evil to be remedied, and the circumstances surrounding the appeal to Congress as disclosed in the records of the proceedings of Congress and other public documents. (Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U. S., 457, 462–465; Johnson v. Southern Pacific Company, 196 U. S., 1, 19.)

In Holy Trinity Church v. United States, supra (1, ch. 463), the court said:

"Again, another guide to the meaning of a statute is found in the evil which it is designed to remedy; and for this the court properly looks at the contemporaneous events, the situation as it existed, and as it was pressed upon the attention of the legislative body."

"It is the duty of the courts, under those circumstances, to say that, however broad the language of the statute may be, the act, although within the letter, is not within the intention of the legislature, and therefore can not be within the statute."

In the present case the title of the act—"An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States"—indicates quite clearly that Congress was not legislating for the benefit or protection of its own membership, since the phrase "the civil service of the United States" has always been understood as comprising principally persons holding office or employment by appointment in the executive departments of the Government. No one reading this title would suppose that Congress had any thought of prohibiting one of its Members from receiving a voluntary campaign contribution from another Member either for the benefit of the first Member individually or for the common benefit of all Members of the same political party.

Again, the evil complained of and disclosed in the records of Congress and other contemporaneous public documents leaves no room for doubt as to what Congress intended to strike down. The exaction of contributions from those holding appointive positions in the Government service to promote the election of Members of Congress had become a national scandal. In 1882 one of the congressional committees openly circularized officeholders for contributions in definite sums. The evil had grown to such proportions that President Arthur brought it to the attention of Congress at the opening of the regular session on December 4, 1882, saying:

"It has, however, been urged, and doubtless not without foundation in fact, that by solicitation of official superiors and by other modes such contributions have at times been obtained from persons whose only motive for giving has been the fear of what might befall them if they refused. It goes without saying that such contributions are not voluntary, and in my judgment their collection should be prohibited by law."

On December 5, 1882, a resolution to investigate the evil was introduced in the Senate by Senator Beck. In the course of the discussion Senator Hoar said:

"I think all or nearly all of us felt sure that the public expression of condemnation of that circular was such that the practice of appealing to officials by a committee of either or both branches of Congress would never be heard of again.

"It is an entirely indelicate and improper relation for Senators or Members of the House of Representatives to be asking contributions, voluntary or involuntary, of persons in the civil service of the Government.

As a result of the agitation, on December 23, 1882, what now constitutes the substance of sections 118, 119, 120, and 121 of the Criminal Code was offered as an amendment to the Pendleton bill (S. 133), "To regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," and became sections 11, 12, 13, and 14 of that act as finally approved January 16, 1883. Nowhere does it appear that it was considered an evil for Members of Congress to give each other financial assistance in their campaign or to contribute to political committees, or that Congress had any thought of prohibiting them from doing so.

It will be observed that the inhibitions of section 118 are only against "soliciting or receiving * * * contributions from any officer, clerk, or employee * * * or from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States" by certain persons therein named, but that this section does not prohibit the making or giving of contributions.

On the other hand, section 121 expressly and explicitly provides that "No officer, clerk, or other person in the service of the United States shall * * * give or hand over to any other officer, clerk, or person in the service of the United States, or to any Senator or Member * * * any money * * * to be applied to the promotion of any political object."

This section does not prohibit soliciting or receiving contributions.

If the Congress intended to include Senators and Members in the class of persons of and from whom contributions should not be "solicited or received," and thought the phrase "any person receiving any salary or compensation from the United States," used in section 118, sufficient to accomplish that purpose, why was it deemed necessary to follow broader and stronger language, namely, "give or hand over to any other officer, clerk, or person in the service of the United States," in section 121, with the particular language, "or to any Senator or Member"? Will anyone contend that the Congress which did not intend the words used in section 121 "or person in the service of the United States" to include Senators and Members did intend the general language used in section 118 to include Senators and Members? True, as hereinbefore conceded, the language of section 118 is broad enough to embrace them. But will it be seriously contended that Congress designed to prohibit solicitation of or contribution from any person who receives "any salary or compensation" from the United States? Such construction would include the man who ferries a mail carrier over a river, as the hire he receives is "compensation" for services rendered. It would include the citizen who receives "compensation" or rent for a building leased to the United States for a post office, hospital, offices, or for any governmental purposes. No one, it seems to the committee, will upon mature reflection insist on such construction of this language.

Congress, in declaring it unlawful to solicit or receive contributions or subscriptions for political purposes from any "officer, clerk, or employee of the United States, or any department, branch, or bureau thereof," legislated with reference to a particular class of persons; and this particular designation is not affected by the subsequent general language—"or from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States."

The doctrine of ejusdem generis applies. Under this rule, where general words follow the enumeration of particular classes of persons or things, the general words will be construed as applicable only to persons or things of the same general nature or class as those enumerated. (36 Cyc., 1119, and cases there cited.)

In United States v. Bevans (3 Wheat., 336), one William Bevans was indicted for murder in the United States Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts. The offense was alleged to have been committed on November 6, 1816, on board the U. S. S. Independence, lying in the main channel of Boston Harbor. The third section of the act of Congress of April 30, 1790, provided—

"That if any person or persons shall within any port, arsenal, dockyard, magazine, or in any other place or district or country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, commit the crime of willful murder, such person or persons being thereof convicted shall suffer death."

It was contended that the United States ship was a "place" within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and jurisdiction was urged on that ground. In reference to this contention Chief Justice Marshall said:

"The objects with which the word 'place' is associated are all in their nature fixed and territorial. A fort, an arsenal, a dockyard, a magazine, are all of this character. When the sentence proceeds with the words, 'or in any other place or district or country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States,' the construction seems irresistible that by the words 'other place' was intended another place of a similar character with those previously enumerated and with that which follows."

Another case illustrating the application of this rule is First National Bank of Anamoose v. United States (206 Fed., 374). One Meyers, of Anamoose, N. Dak., ordered a case of beer of the Hamm Brewing Co., of Minnesota. The brewing company accepted the order and shipped the beer and received bill of lading from the railroad company under an agreement that the company would not deliver the beer to Meyers until he presented the bill of lading to its agent at Anamoose. The brewing company then attached a sight draft on Meyers for the purchase price of the beer to the bill of lading and sent the same to the bank at Anamoose, which agreed with the vendor to collect the same from Meyers and to deliver the bill of lading to him, and thereby complete the sale and delivery of the beer. The bank was convicted of violating section 239 of the Criminal Code, which provides that "Any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or any other person" who, in connection with the transportation of intoxicating liquor from one State to another, shall collect the purchase price or any part thereof from the consignee or any other person, for the purpose of buying, selling, or completing the sale thereof, saving only in the actual transportation and delivery of the same, shall be fined, etc. But the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit promptly reversed the judgment under the doctrine of ejusdem generis, saying:

"To our minds the natural and manifest meaning of the declaration in this law that 'any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or any other person who, in connection with the transportation,' etc., shall collect the purchase price or act as the agent of the buyer or seller, shall be fined, excludes banks, ordinary collectors, and all persons who are not members of the general class of carriers."

During the rather extended debate on the Pendleton and Hawley amendments Senator Beck said:

"I do not know how we can prevent Members of Congress from furnishing money for campaign purposes or publishing their own speeches. I suppose we all do that."

Senator Hoar said:

"The first section of his amendment (referring to what is now section 118 of the Criminal Code) prohibits any officer of the United States from either directly or indirectly making these solicitations of any officer or person receiving compensation from the United States. So the case of a Senator sending his private secretary to the boarding house of an employee is completely covered by the first section."

Senator Hawley, in discussing his amendment (now secs. 118, 119, and 120, Criminal Code), said it—

"only forbids employees collecting from each other and forbids persons going into rooms and offices and there collecting money for political purposes."

Senator Logan said:

"The intention is to keep persons from going into the departments for such purposes."

Senator Harrison said:

"I do not understand that any Senator here controverts the fact that there are legitimate and proper uses to which money may be put in political campaigns. The evil, then, against which we direct our legislation is not the collection of money for political uses; neither is it the corrupt or unlawful use of money in elections. What is it, then? It is simply this, sir, as I understand it: It is to remove from all those in the official service of the United States any other influence or control in their giving than that which may operate upon a private individual. That is what I understand to be the aim; that every clerk in a department and every officer of the Government shall be entirely emancipated from every influence except those influences which may operate upon the unofficial citizen in determining the question whether he will give or not give. The intention is by this bill to remove not only coercive influences but the semblance of them; not only to withhold legal power to exact but to withhold the use of official place which may be treated as an exaction."

Senator Jones said:

"You will see from the nature of this first section that two things are contemplated. First, it is directed against officials occupying high public places under the Government, and is for the protection of those in official station in humble capacity. Now, I say, if you are going to give the humble officeholder protection, make it an offense for any man, whether he be a Senator or Representative, to solicit from a person drawing compensation from the Government of the United States any contribution of money for a political purpose."

Senator Maxey, in discussing his amendment (now sec. 121 of the Criminal Code) to the amendment offered by Senator Hawley (secs. 118, 119, and 120 of the Criminal Code), said:

"The purpose of the amendment to the amendment is a protection of the employees of the Government. If they are prohibited from paying out of their earnings to any Senator, Representative, or Territorial Delegate, or person acting for such, then we effectually put a stop to the political assessment business, so far, at least, as these congressional committees are concerned. That is the object of my amendment."

It is fair to assume from the specific mention of Senators and Representatives in several sections of the act that Congress intended the act to apply to them only when they were specifically mentioned. Moreover, there was a very good reason why Congress would employ the specific designation wherever it intended the act to include Senators and Representatives, as the Attorney General only a few months before, in connection with the very subject of levying contributions upon officeholders, had held that a Member of Congress was not included within the general designation "any officer or employee of the Government." (17 Opin., 419.)

The language employed in the sections being considered, it seems clear that Congress recognized the distinction between Senators and Members of Congress and "officers of the United States." Senators and Members are not "officers" as the term is used.

In United States v. Mouat, reported in 124 U. S., at page 307, Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the court, said:

"What is necessary to constitute a person an officer of the United States in any of the various branches of its service has been very fully considered by this court in United States v. Germaine (99 U. S., 508). In that case it was distinctly pointed out that under the Constitution of the United States all its officers were appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, or by a court of law, or the head of a department; and the heads of the departments were defined in that opinion to be what are now called the members of the Cabinet. Unless a person in the service of the Government, therefore, holds his place by virtue of an appointment by the President or of one of the courts of justice or heads of departments authorized by law to make such an appointment, he is not, strictly speaking, an officer of the United States."

In United States v. Smith, reported in 124 U. S., at page 532, Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said:

"An officer of the United States can only be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by a court of law, or the head of a department. A person in the service of the Government who does not derive his position from one of these sources is not an officer of the United States in the sense of the Constitution."

In Burton v. United States, reported in 202 U. S., at page 369, Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the court, said:

"While the Senate, as a branch of the legislative department, owes its existence to the Constitution and participates in passing laws that concern the entire country, its Members are chosen by State legislatures, and can not properly be said to hold their places 'under the Government of the United States.'"

Finally, if a Member of Congress can not receive campaign contributions from another Member, then members of the same political belief will be prohibited from organizing and supporting a committee of their own members for the purpose of promoting their own reelection or the success of their political party. This would give the statute an effect bordering on absurdity. It is inconceivable that Congress intended any such effect. No reason in morals can be assigned in support of such intention; no demand by the public can be pleaded as its justification; no question of public policy can be urged in its behalf.

We conclude that this is a case where the letter of the law must yield to reason and the intendment of Congress, and that therefore sections 118 and 119 of the Criminal Code should not be construed to prohibit one Senator or Member of Congress from soliciting campaign contributions from another Senator or Member of Congress or from making such solicitation in the office furnished such Senator or Member of Congress in a Government building.

Section 119 of the Criminal Code was also taken from "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," approved January 1, 1883.

If the foregoing conclusion is correct, of course it follows by the same reasoning that section 119 does not prohibit a Member of Congress from mailing requests from his office in the House Office Building to other Members of Congress for campaign contributions.

The committee, after a full consideration of the facts and of the sections of the Criminal Code referred to in the resolution (H. Res. 256), is firmly of opinion that congressional committees or members thereof may lawfully solicit and receive contributions for political purposes from Senators and Representatives in Congress; that such solicitation or receipt of contributions from Senators and Representatives may be lawfully made and had in offices assigned Senators and Representatives in Government buildings; that the appointment by the Speaker of a committee of seven Members of the House to investigate and report upon the matters contained in and referred to in the resolution (H. Res. 256) is wholly useless and unnecessary because they are fully covered by this report.

In accordance with the facts herein reported and the conclusions herein expressed, your committee reports back to the House the resolution (H. Res. 256) with recommendations that the House adopt, as a substitute therefor, the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That it is no violation of section 118 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit or receive assessments or contributions for political purposes from other Senators or Members of the House.

"Resolved, That it is no violation of section 119 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit contributions for political purposes, from other Senators or Members of the House, by letters written in his office in the Senate or House Office Buildings."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have about 10 minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, before I yield the floor I ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes more debate, the time to be consumed by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman want to reserve his one minute?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that debate be extended for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to speak on the resolution?

Mr. WINGO. No.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object; but I used 18 minutes while the gentleman from Missouri used 42 minutes on the resolution.

Mr. WINGO. Of course, if there is the slightest objection, I shall not proceed; but I think it is a fitting time at this moment, as I have been waiting all day for the opportunity.

Mr. MANN. I thought if the gentleman was going to talk on the resolution I might wish some time in which to reply.

Mr. WINGO. No; I do not intend to talk on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has one minute remaining, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] is recognized for 10 minutes.

[Mr. WINGO addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves the previous question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire, before any vote is taken on the matter here to-day——

Mr. MANN. There will be no roll call on the previous question.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. First I want to get this order. To-morrow the Barry statue will be unveiled. I find that there are a great many Members on both sides of the House who desire to be present on that occasion, and I think it would be advisable for the House to adjourn at half past 2, or earlier if we can, in order to allow the Members to be present. I think that if there is no undue delay the Diplomatic and Consular bill could be finished in three hours. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the House meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, so that we can take up the Diplomatic and Consular bill, with the understanding that when that bill is finished the House will adjourn, and that it will adjourn anyhow at half past 2 if the bill is not finished by that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the House meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock instead of 12, and that it adjourn when the Diplomatic and Consular bill is finished, and adjourn at half past 2, whether it is finished or not. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Alabama whether he is able now to make a statement as to whether the Unanimous Consent Calendar will be called Monday or whether the Committee on Rules will bring in a report?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There are a great many gentlemen in the House who desire to have the Unanimous Consent Calendar considered before the rule is adopted; and as that is a sort of field day for the individual Members, and belongs to all the individual Members, I think the Rules Committee have about concluded that they will not bring in the rule until Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, May 16, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 16, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thy grace for the duties of this day. Many of Thy blessings come to us unasked. Thou openest Thy hand and suppliest the need of every living thing. Thy providence is about us, preserving us from harm and danger. Thy grace is given to them that call upon Thee in sincerity and in truth. We come to Thee not only because we hunger and are weak and ignorant, but because we are sinners. We have turned aside from Thy ways. We have done the things that we should not have done. We have left undone the things that we should have done. We seek Thy pardoning grace and Thy love, that this day we may find our hearts in accord with Thy will and our lives channels through which Thy blessings may come to men. Hear us in our prayer; forgive our sins. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HAZELDEN FARM,
Brook, Ind., May 12, 1914.

The Hon. JOHN W. KERN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I live in the country, and I am a member of a society for the protection of our native birds, so I have a double reason for asking you to favor a liberal appropriation for enforcing the new law which is intended to protect our migratory small birds, especially the song and plumage birds.

The new and more stringent laws for the protection of both song birds and game animals are proving most beneficial, so that the living creatures that give character and animation to our woods and fields are going to become plentiful and useful if Congress will continue to have the laws enforced.

I am, with best wishes,
Sincerely,

GEORGE ADE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12806) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation, in the State of Maryland, to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, a municipal corporation of the State of Maryland, making certain provisions in connection therewith, providing access to and from the site of the new immigration station heretofore set aside, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 526) thereon.

TRANSPORTATION BETWEEN ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC PORTS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to ask unanimous consent that a Senate resolution reported yesterday from the Committee on Interstate Commerce may be adopted. It calls for certain information regarding freight charges by rail lines and coastwise vessel lines and the ownership of these rail and vessel lines. The resolution provides that this information shall be obtained by addressing circular letters of inquiry to the various lines, and it will not involve a great amount of labor. The Interstate Commerce Commission say the information will be valuable. They can not obtain it in a satisfactory manner unless this authority is given.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator tell me the calendar number of the resolution?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is Senate resolution 364, Order of Business 457 on the calendar. It is the resolution originally introduced by me as Senate concurrent resolution 23, with certain amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution reported yesterday from the Committee on Interstate Commerce by Mr. NEWLANDS, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and hereby is, authorized and requested to ascertain, by addressing circular letters of inquiry to rail lines, coastwise vessel lines, and such other lines as may be deemed advisable, and requiring, wherever deemed necessary, replies to be returned at a specified date in the near future, and, as soon as practicable, report to Congress the following information:

First. To what extent, if any, vessels and steamship lines are engaged in transporting freight between Atlantic and Pacific ports wholly by water, or partly by water and partly by rail, and in the coastwise trade of the United States, under joint ownership or common control or in community of interest, directly or indirectly, by stock ownership, trust, holding committee, or otherwise, with railroad companies engaged in transporting freight by rail between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States and in the coastwise trade of the United States, stating separately what vessels and steamship lines are owned and controlled by said railroad companies, if any, and what vessels and steamship lines in said transportation are under a common or joint ownership or control with said railroad companies, or any thereof, and the names of the owners, stockholders, trustees, holding committees, directors, and officers of all steamship lines and railroads engaged in the coastwise and foreign trade of the United States. And to what extent and how, if any, they are consolidated, directed, or operated by and through holding companies, interlocking stocks, interlocking directorates, or interlocking officers.

Second. What are the prevailing rates upon the principal commodities carried by vessels between said Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States wholly by water or partly by water and partly by rail across the Isthmus of Panama or Tehuantepec, and what are the prevailing rates between said Atlantic and Pacific ports upon such commodities transported wholly by rail and what are the prevailing rates for transportation of similar commodities wholly by water by vessels not under United States registry for similar distances as the water routes between said Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States carried under similar conditions.

Third. And what are the prevailing rates upon the principal commodities carried by vessels in the coastwise trade of the United States in comparison with such rates on similar commodities for similar distances carried by vessels in the foreign trade of the United States.

Fourth. And what are the prevailing rates for transportation for similar commodities wholly by water by vessels not under United States registry for similar distances on similar commodities, under similar conditions in comparison with the rates on commodities transported in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator that almost all the information asked for in the resolution has been obtained under House resolution 587, "Report of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries on steamship agreements and affiliations in the American foreign and domestic trade."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand that the report referred to by the Senator from Utah does not contain the exact information requested by my resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit that there are a few items embraced in the resolution that are not covered by this report, but I would say offhand that it covers probably at least three-fourths of the information asked for in the resolution.

However, if the Interstate Commerce Commission feel that it is necessary to have this information, and the subject matter being before the Senate at present, I shall not object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, one fact will be developed through this inquiry, and that is that the oft-repeated statement that the coastwise shipping of this country is a trust or that it is controlled by railroads will be found to be not accurate. The fact is that out of 24,765 steamships and sailing ships engaged in the coastwise trade there are only 330 that are controlled in the way suggested. So this information will be valuable.

The statement which has gone forth was due to a casual reading of Prof. Huebner's report and the report of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives. The ships that are owned by railroads or in combinations are in the "regular" line service and do not include the smaller ships—those that may be called tramp steamers, and so forth, engaged in carrying heavy commodities, which aggregate 24,435 ships out of a total of 24,765 ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

So if all this information has not already been obtained, the resolution ought to be passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the resolution? The Chair hears none. By unanimous consent, the resolution is adopted.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Wednesday, May 20, at the conclusion of the routine business, I shall address the Senate on the Panama Canal tolls question.

TRANSPORTATION OF PARCEL-POST MATTER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 363, by Mr. SMITH of Georgia, requesting the Joint Committee on Postage on Second-Class Mail Matter and Compensation of Transportation of Mails to report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the resolution may go over without prejudice until Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution goes over without prejudice. The morning business is closed.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask that House bill 14385, the unfinished business, be now laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Gallinger	Overman	Smoot
Brady	Gore	Page	Sterling
Bristow	Gronna	Perkins	Stone

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it would, perhaps, be vain to hope that at this stage of the discussion of the important question now receiving the consideration of the Senate any enlightenment could be afforded by any contribution which I might make. I am not unmindful of the importance of bringing this debate to a speedy close, that some of the many measures of the most urgent character on the calendar—not a few of them of vital interest to the section of the country from which I come—may have the attention of the Senate before the adjournment of the session. In the state of the public business I am convinced that the Senator who refrains from talking except necessarily to illuminate the subject under consideration renders a specific service to his country. It will, I trust, not be regarded as a breach of the amenities of this body if I express the hope that brevity may come to be regarded here as a virtue rather than a weakness, and that eventually we shall appreciate that time is short and that the volume of business intrusted to us and which we are unable to dispatch, try as we may, is continually increasing. Some reform in our methods is imperatively demanded. Considerations to which it is unnecessary to advert justify me, however, to myself, at least, notwithstanding the reflections to which expression has just been given, in submitting some comments on the subject before us indicative of the line of thought by which I have arrived at a conclusion that impels me to oppose the pending measure.

The question presents itself in a moral and in an economical aspect; it has a legal and a political phase. It is asserted that the law, the repeal of which is sought, is violative of the obligations to which the Nation bound itself by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and that it is contrary to sound economics. It might be noted in passing that, as a rule, the exceptions to which are so rare as to emphasize rather than disturb it, those who insist that the law runs counter to the treaty are equally denunciatory of the policy which it embodies; those who are convinced of the error of the law, viewed from the standpoint of economics, are quite certain that the honor of the Nation can be preserved only by its repeal. On the other hand, those who find no want of harmony between the law and the treaty, generally speaking, justify the economic policy of the law or regard it as at least tolerable and quite defensible. This striking coincidence may well make every disputant less arrogant of his own and more tolerant of the opinion of those who differ with him. Which of us can say that his views on this question are not to some extent, and possibly to a very considerable extent, governed by irrelevant considerations which may bias his mind, by prejudice more or less deep-seated, and by habits of thought so pronounced in character as insensibly to lead the reasoner to a conclusion which those familiar with them may unerringly foresee?

Why should anyone in this discussion make any appeal to uphold the national honor? Is there any ground for believing that those who oppose the present bill are less sensitive concerning the national honor, less scrupulous in regard to the observance of treaty rights, than those who advocate it? Is it to be assumed that, being convinced of the error of the contention they make concerning the construction to be given to the treaty, they are still willing to maintain and uphold the law? Can it be doubted that if it were authoritatively determined, say, by an adjudication of the Supreme Court, that the inconsistency claimed does in fact exist, they would not hasten to join in securing an immediate repeal of the law? To suggest even in this controversy the necessity of maintaining the national honor is to reveal in the mind of him who advances it a lurking suspicion that some one is willing it should be besmirched. He who permits himself to indulge such has no reason to complain if some ungenerous antagonist accuses him of unpatriotic surrender of what he believes, or ought to know, if he cared to inquire, to be the rights of his country, moved by ignoble fear or base selfishness. One of the witnesses who appeared before the committee to which the bill before us was referred felt called upon to expatiate upon the commercial advantages which might be expected to flow from observance of treaty obligations. In the consciousness of his own rectitude, he was impressed not only with the depravity of those who differed with him, but labored under the belief that they would be insensible to any but an "honesty is the best policy" line of reasoning.

Why should anyone dread that in a controversy such as this the esteem in which our country is held among the nations of the earth should suffer any impairment? The high character of the officials of our Government who asserted and maintained our right under the treaty to enact the law now questioned when it was under consideration by Congress ought to be and is sufficient assurance to the world that, however mistaken they may have been in their views, they were honestly proclaimed. Those who still adhere to the construction so ably defended by them are entitled to the same generous presumption. The situation was reversed in the long controversy over the Welland Canal, to which reference will be made again. We stoutly maintained that Canada had violated the treaty of Washington in certain acts affecting vessels passing through that canal. She as strenuously insisted that the legislation complained of was within her rights. Great Britain, having upheld her colony for years in this controversy, after retaliatory legislation on our part, yielded without acknowledging the error of her position. No one ever heard that Great Britain became an international outcast because of her attitude in that episode, though it is now insisted that the question involved was identical with that with which we are now called upon to deal, and that England was as wrong then as we are now. If we are subject to the imputation of perfidy in connection with the present controversy, how can England escape a like imputation in relation to the other? Why should the purity of our motives be questioned by the nations of the earth and hers remain unstained? She exhibited no dread of the judgment of mankind, and why should we, who are convinced that we yielded no right by the treaty under which she now claims the surrender of which forbids the action against which she protests?

THE TREATY CONSIDERED.

Without assuming that I shall be able to do more than to present the arguments heretofore advanced in a new light or in a somewhat different setting, I proceed to consider whether the act in question is in contravention of the treaty. Its language is as follows:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nation observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall e bark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible, but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ARTICLE 4.

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ARTICLE 5.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and one.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

If we should shut our eyes to every other provision in this instrument, examine cursorily only the first of the six rules prescribed in article 3, omitting, as is ordinarily done, in any argument in support of the construction contended for by Great Britain the important words "observing these rules," ignoring the distinction which all nations have made between coastwise trade and over-seas commerce, the conclusion that the clause of the act at which the bill before us is aimed is out of harmony with the treaty might easily enough be reached.

But a consideration of the instrument as a whole must quickly force from the candid student an admission that the true meaning is not quite so plain as attention alone to the fragment referred to might suggest. Reason and authority alike demand that we should examine the entire instrument to arrive at the ideas which the high contracting parties intended to convey by the language they chose. This rule is as applicable to contracts between nations as it is to written agreements between individuals.

Even if we confine our attention to that portion of the treaty by which it is said we surrendered in part our right to control the canal, the most serious question will arise as to its significance. It appears that it is one of six rules which the United States adopts or prescribes concerning the use of the canal. It does not declare that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of all nations, as has often been said, but only to those of such nations as shall observe the rules prescribed by the United States, the builder and owner of the canal. If any nation shall fail to observe the rules thus laid down, its vessels may be excluded from the canal, and whether they shall go through or not, in consequence of failure to observe the rules, must be determined by the United States, the owner of the canal. It must not only determine whether a violation of the rules has occurred on the part of any nation, but it must enforce the penalty consequent upon such failure, which may extend to the exclusion of the vessels of the offending nation from the canal. Perhaps in case of a dispute of fact or in case of a controversy as to whether the acts complained of by our Government constitute an infraction of the rules, the nation whose vessels were thus excluded might call for an arbitration; but the responsibility is on the United States of deciding in the first instance and enforcing the judgment, whether pronounced by it or by an arbitral tribunal. But is it to be gathered that if the United States should be guilty of a disregard of the rules it "adopts," it forfeits its right to the use of the canal? If so, what power passes the judgment of guilty against it, and what nation enforces that judgment, and how? If the United States be one of the nations referred to in rule 1 of the treaty, then we have, by the passage of the act of 1912, disregarded its provisions, assuming that coastwise craft are included in the words "vessels of commerce and war" as therein used, and, being no longer one of the "nations observing these rules," have no right to pass any ships through the canal. Moreover, if the United States be indeed one of "all nations" therein referred to, its vessels "of war" must pay the same tolls for passage through the canal as the vessels of war of all other nations, and the treaty would require the absurd formality of taking money from the Treasury of the Government to be paid to itself as tolls for the privilege of passing its men-of-war through its own canal, the sums thus paid to be in due course returned to the Treasury from which they came.

It is said that the net result being the same, the Government may be excused from the payment of tolls on its warships, though those of other nations are made to contribute. It is likewise advanced that the duty of maintaining the neutral character of the canal, so far as it is neutral, being by the treaty imposed upon the United States, and upon it alone, it is implied that its vessels of war may pass through the canal free, since it is presumed that they are in the discharge of the duty thus cast upon our Government, it being impossible to differentiate between service which falls within that duty and such as is beyond its scope, and because, if it were, the naval authorities ought not to be called upon to disclose the particular mission in pursuit of which the canal is opened for the reception of our fleet or any part of it.

But what is this argument but an admission that, by reason of the peculiar relations our Government sustains to the canal, its vessels of war, so far as payment of tolls is concerned, are not included in the expression used in the treaty, "vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules"?

This line of argument is not applicable, however, to a great variety of craft in the Government service, such as revenue cutters, lighthouse tenders, and such as carry officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and employees of the Bureau of Fisheries, and the like.

The question is still pertinent as to whether the formality of taking money from one pocket and putting it into another must be observed in the case of the passage of any of these vessels through the canal. Such vessels do not engage in trade, and foreign nations are not materially affected nor much interested whatever course may be pursued as to them, provided their use of the canal be considered in determining the proportionate amount which may be exacted of their vessels for canal privileges. But the Government of the United States owns, in effect, a fleet of vessels engaged in the transportation of passengers and merchandise in connection with the work of constructing the canal. They ply between New York and Cristobal, and do a general carrying business in competition with privately owned lines. In all probability they will be employed in a like capacity when the work of constructing railroads in Alaska is actively undertaken, pursuant to the act passed at the present session. It is not improbable that some or all of these vessels will run regularly between New York and some seaport of Alaska, transporting supplies and incidentally conducting a regular commercial business in competition with the Canadian transcontinental railroads and the steamers connecting with their western terminals. Must the Government, from its revenues, pay the tolls on these ships as they pass through the canal, the amount to be returned to the Treasury whence it came?

A bill recently introduced by the junior Senator from Massachusetts, which is approved by the Navy Department, contemplates putting cruisers—being ships of war—into the trade between Atlantic ports and the west coast of South America. The purpose is to divert to our merchants a large share of the trade of the southern Republics whose shores are washed by the Pacific that would otherwise go to their European rivals. Will these ships be required to pay tolls? And was it intended at the time the treaty was signed that they should? To what end? Why should any nation now ask that they should? How can it or its ships profit by what is a pure formality, a mere matter of bookkeeping? And why should Great Britain have asked for a provision of the treaty which exacted it?

Undoubtedly the "vessels of commerce of all nations," referred to in the section under consideration, include ships privately owned engaged in the commercial carrying trade, as well as any which the various Governments may put into that business. Merchantmen flying the Stars and Stripes are spoken of as "our vessels" and as "vessels of the United States." The treaty in question is a compact between nations. Each deals with the other as though it were the owner of all vessels sailing under its authority. It speaks in the possessive as to ships owned by its citizens as well as those which are Government property. The treaty makes no distinction between privately owned ships engaged in commerce and such ships as those heretofore referred to now engaged similarly, and likely hereafter to be so employed, as are the property of the United States. It is impossible to make the language applicable to the one class of ships and not to the other.

It is said that the exemption extended by the existing law to coastwise vessels is a subsidy; that it is equivalent to turning over to the ship to which it applies, passing through the canal, simultaneously with the payment of the same by it, the amount of money which it would otherwise pay. I shall address myself to this question later on. I pause to remark that those most confident of the infraction of the treaty by the canal act are most emphatic, not to say eloquent, in denunciation of the policy it embodies, as a subsidy pure and simple. That brings us to the inquiry as to whether we may consistently with the treaty grant a subsidy to our ships—that is, privately owned American ships passing through the canal—equal to the amount of the tolls exacted under the law of such of them as are subject to the payment of tolls.

If we adopted that policy we should provide American vessels out of the Treasury on entering the canal the money with which to pay the tolls or reimburse them immediately upon their having paid such. The transaction in that event would be identical with that accompanying the passage of a man-of-war or other Government vessel. Our vessels—our vessels of commerce as well as our vessels of war—would pass through under conditions substantially identical, as though they all belonged to the Government.

It is not quite clear what the view of the English foreign office is touching our right thus to subsidize or reimburse privately owned American vessels in the amount which they may be required to pay for passage through the canal, thus accomplishing by indirection what it is said we are forbidden to do directly, namely, exempt them from the payment of any tolls.

In the note of Mr. Innis, chargé d'affaires, to our Secretary of State, of date July 8, 1912, the position is quite clearly announced that the treaty forbids us either to grant a subsidy equal to the tolls exacted or to do what is equivalent thereto, renounce them altogether, for he says:

> The proposal to exempt all American shipping from the payment of them would, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, involve an infraction of the treaty, nor is there, in their opinion, any difference in principle between charging tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether.

And yet Lord Grey, in his letter to Ambassador Bryce, of November 14, 1912, says that—

> They do not seek to deprive the United States of any liberty which is open either to themselves or to any other nation; nor do they find either in the letter or in the spirit of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty any surrender by either of the contracting parties of the right to encourage its shipping or its commerce by such subsidies as it may deem expedient.

The senior Senator from Massachusetts apparently entertains no doubt that we may with entire propriety pursue the indirect route to attain the same end. If I gathered correctly the purport of his eloquent and forceful address delivered during the early stage of the present debate, he complained only that we had gone about the business so bunglingly, intimating that had we diplomatically required the payment of tolls by all our vessels and then remitted what had been exacted of those engaged in the coastwise trade no protest would ever have been made, or, if made, would have been easily and effectively answered.

Certain it is that unless we are at liberty thus to subsidize our shipping that may be required to pay tolls for passage through the canal we are at a decided disadvantage among the nations of the earth. We have bound ourselves by the treaty and left them free. We have no means of restraining any of them in the pursuit of such a policy should they see fit to follow it. Nearly all the maritime nations of Europe repay to their ships any sums they are required to expend for passage through the Suez Canal, and it is understood that most of them purpose meeting in the same way the burden which our Government may impose as a fee for crossing the Isthmus of Panama. The burden upon our Nation will be exactly the same whether we pursue the course we have elected to follow or the one which it is apparently conceded we may consistently with the treaty. In either case the disadvantages under which foreign interests will labor are identical.

If, then, we may legitimately reach the result that would be attained by the act complained of by following another method, what reason have we for believing that England in negotiating the treaty chose language that would foreclose our right to exempt our ships from the payment of tolls or that we selected such phraseology as would give her the assurance that we were to be so foreclosed? The negotiators had in mind the practice of the countries of Europe, even of England herself, in connection with her shipping passing through the Suez Canal.

Imagine the representatives of the two countries in conference. The United States proposes to undertake this stupendous work at her own cost and her own risk, not only to construct it, but to maintain and defend it as a great international highway, open to all the nations of the earth, to expend $400,000,000, as the event demonstrated, for the benefit of the commerce of the world. Great Britain's statesmen had exhibited no feverish anxiety to engage in it, and yet, as our ambassador remarked on an historic occasion, she was to be the chief beneficiary, at least commercially. Her ships exceed in tonnage those of all other nations combined. It was to open up a direct route to her possessions in the Orient. It was to give her great dependency, our neighbor on the north, water communication from the Atlantic seaboard to the Provinces of the Dominion that skirt the Pacific. It is not disclosed by any of the correspondence that the specific question of whether the United States might, if it saw fit, exempt its vessels from the payment of tolls was debated or considered. The differences arose over the question of fortifications and another, to which it was ancillary, the independent control of the canal by the United States as distinguished from a control in which other nations should participate to a greater or lesser degree. As the great impelling motive on our part was military, we wanted to be free to shut the canal against any enemy in time of war.

England was not proposing to do anything. She was not offering to build the canal under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. For 50 years that instrument had simply tied the hands of both nations, neither of which contemplated for a moment at any time toward the close of the nineteenth century entering upon the work pursuant to its stipulations or encouraging private capital to do so. England did not profess to have any purpose to build the canal independently of it. She had not sought to be freed from its obligations that she might undertake the task. On the contrary, the purpose of the American people to dig the canal had been repeatedly proclaimed. England could not endure the odium that would attach to a dog-in-the-manger policy with reference to this great work of such transcendant importance to the civilized world. Her interest impels her to assent to any reasonable proposals of the American Government. Her pride forbids her to place further obstacles in its way. She has no basis on which she may claim anything except a half century old treaty, never acted upon, moribund if not dead, solemnly asserted by the United States Senate to be obsolete and open to notification and only feebly defended by her as still a living thing. Her ministers make the best of such trading stock as they have. But let us consider that the representatives of our country insist, in view of the enormous obligation the United States is to assume, on a specific provision in the treaty to the effect that it may at its will exempt its shipping from the payment of tolls, and yet that the tolls exacted of foreign ships must be fair and reasonable and exacted without favoritism or discrimination.

Can anyone imagine the English ministers so blind to their own interest, so irresponsive to the desires of the commercial world, as to break off the negotiations? They must reason that as to all Government ships it is immaterial whether tolls are collected or not, and as to privately owned ships, the same result could be arrived at by pursuing exactly the policy Great Britain follows with reference to her own ships paying tolls at Suez. In yielding they would be conceding no power that could not be exercised indirectly at least.

Considering only the section that insures equality of treatment to all nations "observing these rules," the conclusion seems quite illogical that the United States subjected itself to any restraint in the matter of exempting its own ships from the payment of tolls; that is to say, the United States is not and was not intended by the parties entering into the convention to be included in the expression "all nations" as therein used. The language must be restricted in its significance to the intentions of the high contracting parties. Early in the history of the development of the law applicable to the interpretation of statutes an English court said:

> The judges of the law in all times past have so far pursued the intent of the makers of statutes that they have expounded acts which were general in words to be but particular where the intent was particular. * * * Those statutes which comprehend all things in the letter they have expounded to extend back, but to some things, and those which generally prohibit all people from doing such an act, they have interpreted to permit some people to do it, and those which include every person in the letter they have adjudged to reach to some persons only, which expositions have always been founded on the intent of the legislature which they have collected sometimes by considering the cause and necessity of making the act, sometimes by comparing one part of the act with another, and sometimes by foreign circumstances. (Stradling v. Morgan, Plowd., 199.)

But if an attentive consideration of the rule of equality upon which reliance is placed by those who assert that the existing law violates it leads to the contrary conclusion, it seems impossible, upon a study of the treaty as a whole, to avoid that result.

Article 1 briefly declares that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is superseded.

Article 2 declares that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the United States, which, subject to the treaty, shall have all the rights incident to such construction, including the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Just why it should be deemed necessary to provide that the canal might be built under the auspices of the United States, when the only obstacle had been removed by the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it is perhaps fruitless to inquire. So, likewise, it would seem that it was quite unnecessary to stipulate that the United States should have all rights incident to construction if it did prosecute the work. Obviously they would have such rights, except as the treaty waived them.

In the effort to support the view that we have violated the treaty in exempting our coastwise vessels it is advanced that we do not enjoy unreservedly the rights incident to ownership, but find ourselves limited by the language of the article under consideration, "subject to the provisions of the present treaty."

It is agreed that we have placed some restraint on our action by the convention. But the phrase referred to has its appropriate application, whichever view of the controversy may be taken.

All admit that we have bound ourselves to treat alike all foreign nations observing the rules which we prescribe. The use of the language of article 2 quoted is without significance in the present inquiry.

Article 3 is introduced with the following language:

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say.

Then follow six rules, the first of which alone has heretofore been canvassed. These are rules, it will be noted, which the United States "adopts" concerning the use of the canal which it is to build.

The right asserted by Great Britain rests upon the language of the first of these rules. With that with which it is introduced, the conclusion follows logically, as I think, that the rules of which it is the initial number were intended to define the rights and obligations of other nations in respect to the canal, to prescribe the conditions under which they might make use of it.

The second rule declares that "the canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it." Is it believed that this rule is operative against the United States? We deny it and are erecting fortifications at either end intended to destroy any enemy that may come within range of the most powerful guns known to modern warfare. The military defense of the canal for which we are making preparations will involve an annual expenditure, it is estimated, of $10,000,000. If a menacing fleet, say, from Japan, appears at either gate, intent upon attacking our ports or laying waste our coast, must we speed it passage and forbear to raise a hand against it?

The third rule recites that vessels of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; the fourth, that no belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit; the fifth, that vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in the waters adjacent to the canal and within 3 miles of either end longer than 24 hours at any one time, and that a vessel of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent. Can it be seriously contended that these rules apply to the United States; that should a general war with Mexico be precipitated, and should we find it necessary to send a vessel of war around to the west coast of that country, it could not revictual or take on stores in the canal; that while the war lasted we could not embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in it or in the adjacent waters? Will it be asserted that being a belligerent, at war with some European nation, one of our ships separated from the rest of the fleet and pursued by an enemy of overwhelming power could not take refuge under the sheltering guns that might thunder from the fortified islands off the western entrance to the canal?

Some answer must be given to these and like pertinent inquiries before the view can be accepted that the rules which by article 3 the United States "adopts" as the basis of the neutralization of the canal can be held applicable to us.

What answer has been made? The British Government was not insensible to the difficulty of harmonizing the view advanced by it with the provisions of the five rules other than the first.

In the letter of Lord Grey to Ambassador Bryce, dated December 9, 1912, the writer, noticing the conclusions so obviously to be drawn from the provisions of the rules other than the first—he speaks specifically of the third, fourth, and fifth—says:

Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

But article 4 of the treaty provides:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

It would be quite reasonable to believe—indeed, it would naturally be assumed—that this provision contemplated transfer of sovereignty consequent upon the recurring revolutions that make so unstable the government of many of the Latin-American Republics, and not the acquisition by the United States of sovereignty over the territory through which the canal might be constructed.

But we are forbidden to narrow the application of article 4 to such a transfer because of what we are told by our ambassador, Mr. Choate, touching the reasons for its incorporation in the draft which eventually received the formal approbation of the high contracting parties.

In his letter to Secretary Hay, dated August 20, 1901, he says, speaking of article 4:

The idea "change of sovereignty," of course, relates to the report of an intention on the part of the United States to acquire a strip of territory on each side of the canal, and "other change of circumstances" is aimed at the argument in some future epoch against the continuance of this treaty that has often been directed against the continuing binding force of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that "change of circumstances" since 1850 has put an end to it.

He returns to this subject in his letter to the Secretary of date September 21, 1901, wherein, referring to a further conference which he had had in London with Lord Pauncefote, he says:

He no longer insisted upon the words "or other change of circumstances" not affecting the treaty, against my insistance that there might be changes of circumstances which would affect or even nullify a treaty; that there was such a principle of international law, which we can not let go; that what such change of circumstances might be is not determined, nor was it easy to foresee what changes of circumstances might come upon the United States in the next hundred years. But he said they could not give up article 3A altogether; that it was quite obvious that we might in the future acquire all the territory on both sides of the canal; that we might then claim that a treaty providing for the neutrality of a canal running through a neutral country could no longer apply to a canal that ran through American territory only.

I do not mean to assert that what our ambassador said, even in the course of his official letters telling of the negotiations concerning the significance of this particular article, is by any means controlling, for I shall contend that we are concerned rather with what the Senate of the United States believed and had a right to believe the language of the treaty meant when ratified by it than by what our negotiators thought would be the effect of any specific provision of it or of the treaty as a whole.

But the letter quoted discloses as an historical fact that it was, while the negotiations were pending, anticipated in England that we might acquire the sovereignty over the territory traversed by the canal, and that it was with that probability in mind the provision under consideration was inserted.

Under these conditions we are not justified in narrowing the scope of the language, plainly embracing it, so as to exclude a transfer of sovereignty to the United States.

We are, accordingly, subject to every provision of the treaty by which we would have been bound had there never been any transfer of territorial sovereignty, for the article plainly states that no such transfer shall either affect the principle of neutralization or the obligation of the "high contracting parties" under the treaty.

By way of digression here I remark that I am utterly unable to agree with some Senators, for whose opinions touching such matters I entertain the highest respect, in the view that the acquisition of sovereignty by the United States over the Canal Zone terminated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I can not resist the conclusion that such a condition was anticipated by the representatives of Great Britain, and that express provision was made that it should not. The extract from the letter of Mr. Choate demonstrates, if anything in diplomacy is capable of demonstration, that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty survived the extension of our sovereignty over the territory acquired by us from Panama.

But it is of no practical consequence if the result which is claimed in that regard did follow. We acquired the sovereignty over the Canal Zone and our right to construct the canal by virtue of our treaty with Panama, proclaimed February 26, 1904, the eighteenth article of which is as follows:

The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

We are accordingly bound by our treaty with Panama in our regulation, management, and control of the canal to observe all the stipulations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and we have no more disposition to disregard our obligations to the feeble Republic than to the Mistress of the Seas, who might enforce them.

If, however, Lord Grey is right, that we may exercise belligerent rights in the canal, if we are wholly or in part exempt from the operation of rules 3, 4, and 5, only because we now exercise sovereign power over the territory traversed by it, then it follows of necessity that had we not acquired the sovereignty which the treaty of Panama gives us, if we had constructed the canal under merely an easement such as the French company enjoyed and such as we would have acquired from Colombia under the Hay-Herran treaty had it become effective, we would have been bound by all the rules and particularly by rules 3, 4, and 5.

Is that the attitude taken by Members of this body, who agree with the general conclusion at which he arrives?

The explanation convicts the British negotiators of perpetrating the absurdity of inserting a provision restraining us from the exercise of acts of hostility should the canal be constructed in foreign territory within which we could wage war only by permission of the local sovereignty and leaving us free to do as we liked should we acquire the sovereignty, a condition which they were informed was likely to ensue.

Can it be possible that we had so bound ourselves by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that but for the accident of the revolution by which Panama asserted her independence or some other similar convulsion, as a result of which we should find an opportunity to acquire rights of sovereignty over the territory through which we should construct a canal, it would become a convenient channel through which hostile fleets might pass unhindered to ravage our coasts and sack our cities? Were we, indeed, forbidden by rule 2 from exercising any right of war or committing any act of hostility within it?

I propose to show that neither party regarded us as so enjoined. The original Hay-Pauncefote treaty contained a provision to the effect that "no fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent." This was omitted in the later treaty. What significance can be given to this omission except it be that Great Britain withdrew her opposition to our fortifying the works? Can it be possible that the later treaty without this language was to be given the same construction as the earlier one which contained it? But to what end was the United States to be permitted to erect fortifications except to exercise rights of war and commit acts of hostility, if need be, within the canal? To what use are fortifications put except to repel the advances and if possible to destroy the forces and engines of war of our enemy? Whatever basis she had theretofore under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to object to our fortifying any canal we might build, she had none after the Hay-Pauncefote treaty went into effect. In the last letter of Mr. Choate to Secretary Hay, telling of the negotiations with the English foreign office, he concludes his narration by referring in complimentary terms to Lord Lansdowne, of whom he says:

> In substance he abrogates the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, gives us an American canal, ours to build as and where we like, to own, control, and govern, on the sole condition of its being always neutral and free for the passage of the ships of all nations on equal terms, except that if we get into a war with any nation we can shut its ship out and take care of ourselves.

If that does not mean that we were at liberty to repel by armed force the ships of a hostile nation approaching the canal, it will be difficult to assign any significance to it.

In the earlier treaty the counterpart of rule 1 declared that—

> The canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, etc.

Plainly the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" in the new draft, with the omission of the interdict on fortifications, is irreconcilable with the idea that we were forbidden by rule 2 to commit any act of war or engage in hostilities within the canal.

The significance of the alteration in the language of rule 2 is made clear by Mr. Choate's words: "If we get into a war with any nation, we can shut its ships out and take care of ourselves." The change was made, it would appear, lest any nation might claim that, though it was at war with the United States, its ships were entitled to pass through the canal without hazard of acts of hostility from them.

In appreciation of the inconclusive character of the explanation offered by the British minister touching our rights should we become belligerents and those we would have been entitled to exercise under like conditions had we not acquired the sovereignty of the Canal Zone, it is said on the floor of the Senate that the rules subsequent to the first found in article 3 would not be applicable in case we were at war, since the treaty would then fail and be inoperative. Undoubtedly if we were at war with England the treaty would not restrain our action. Neither party would pay any attention to its treaties with the other under such conditions. Inter armes silent leges.

But a war between the United States and some nation other than Great Britain would not terminate the treaty.

The inquiry being pursued assumes the existence of war between our country and, for example, Japan, with which it is understood she sustains intimate treaty relations. If we use the canal as a military base against any nation other than herself, have we violated the treaty and given her provocation to make war upon us also? Have we failed to observe "these rules" and thus forfeited the right to have our own ships pass the canal? Unquestionably that is the predicament in which we are placed if rule 2, except as therein specified, applies to the United States at all.

It ought to be noted, in passing, that, though Lord Lansdowne declared that by acquiring the sovereignty over the territory traversed by the canal, rules 3, 4, and 5 were perhaps not applicable to the United States, he refrained ominously from committing himself as to rule 2.

Still another effort to resist the compelling force of the terms of the later rules upon the construction that should be given to the treaty as a whole is to be noticed. It is said that inasmuch as we are obligated to defend and preserve the neutrality of the canal we must be permitted to defend it against attack by hostile forces, even to wage offensive war the better to defend this great highway, and that therefore we are not subject to the restrictions which are imposed upon other belligerents.

In the first place, we have not undertaken either to defend the canal or to preserve its neutrality. We shall choose to do both and to observe strict neutrality in our management of it between any two warring nations. But we violate no obligation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by any inaction on our part.

If it be admitted, however, that we are bound both to defend it and to maintain the neutrality of the canal, is not the argument that by reason of such obligation we are not bound by rules 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 an admission that by reason of the peculiar relations we sustain to the canal our Nation is not within the spirit, though it may be within the letter, of the language used? And if this be true, why was not the exemption plainly expressed, making rule 2 to read: The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised, nor any act of hostility be committed within it, except by the United States.

Rule 3. Vessels of war of a belligerent, other than the United States, shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal, etc.

Rule 4. No belligerent, other than the United States, shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, etc.

Rule 5. Vessels of war of a belligerent, other than the United States, shall not remain in such waters (within 3 miles of either end) longer than 24 hours at any one time, etc.

Rule 6. The plant, etc., shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, other than the United States, etc.

There is only one answer to make, namely, that such repetition was unnecessary, as none of the rules applied to the United States.

It must be admitted that the concluding clause of rule 2 presents a problem in construction not easy of solution. The first sentence is a prohibition of acts of war within the canal. Then follows this: "The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder." It might seem that this clause defines the extent to which the canal might be garrisoned and that the purpose of its insertion was that the United States, being bound by what preceded, the language of the prohibition was not to be deemed to extend to the employment of military police for the suppression of lawlessness and disorder. It would follow reasonably that if the United States was bound by rule 2, except as therein stated, it was bound by all the other rules.

But this view is not to be tolerated, because it is admitted on all sides that we are not, and never were, limited by the treaty in respect to the armed forces we might maintain at and about the canal to military police for the suppression of lawlessness and disorder. This clause obviously does not entitle us to maintain there a military establishment adequate to repel invading armies. The conditions contemplated are those of peace, not war. Police perform civil, not military, duties, and military police are civil officers having a military organization. Lawlessness and disorder often accompany war, but these terms are not applied to disturbances implied in invasion by an armed public foe.

The right to erect fortifications for the defense of the canal being clearly conceded, the right to engage in hostilities in and from the canal must likewise have been conceded. Indeed, there was a frank acknowledgment on the part of Great Britain in the course of the negotiations of her purpose to permit us to defend the canal against hostile attack, as appears by the following from the letter of Mr. Choate of August 16, 1901, to Secretary Hay, namely:

> He (Lord Lansdowne) recognizes our "desire to reserve the power of taking measures to protect the canal at any time when we are engaged in war"; that "contingencies may arise when it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a moment when they were themselves engaged in hostilities," and "the necessity" and, of course, "the right of the United States to interfere temporarily with the free use of the canal by the shipping of another power."

The clause under consideration formed a part of rule 7 of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which forbids the erection of fortifications. It had an appropriate place in connection with such a provision. Its significance in the new treaty is exceedingly obscure.

It can not be admitted, however, that the rules other than the first two apply to the United States, and the conclusion necessarily follows that none of them do.

COASTWISE SHIPPING.

But if the United States is included in the expression "all nations," as used in the first rule, it does not follow that the exemption attached, which extends only to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, is in violation of the treaty.

I propose to be brief in my presentation of this contention, in view of the elaborate consideration it has received, intending to return to notice a line of argument that has been followed touching the conclusions that are to be drawn from the reference in the treaty to the principle of neutralization and from declarations of statesmen touching our purpose to give to all nations the benefits accruing from the construction of the canal equally with ourselves.

All maritime nations have recognized in their legislation an essential difference between ships engaged in the coastwise trade—that is, ships sailing from one domestic port to another—and those in over-seas commerce, sailing between the ports of different nations. Our laws admit to the coastwise trade only American vessels. Until recently Great Britain pursued a similar policy. Prior to 1817 the monopoly of the coastwise trade was secured to American shipping by discriminatory tonnage duties. In that year a law of Congress was enacted declaring that "no goods, wares, or merchandise shall be imported, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, from one port of the United States to another port of the United States in a vessel belonging wholly or in part to a subject of a foreign power." Save for some unimportant exceptions since engrafted upon the law, applicable to shipping in the waters adjacent to Canada, it remains in force to this day. Two years before it had its birth the treaty of Ghent was signed, containing a provision to the effect that—

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territory in Europe in the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Notwithstanding the obligation imposed by the language of that treaty, the United States not only continued to impose upon British vessels entering our ports heavier tonnage and other dues than were exacted of our own vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, theretofore so onerous on foreign ships as, in effect, to be prohibitive, but the latter were denied the right to engage in that trade at all.

In this legislation Kent says that the United States only imitated the policy of England and other commercial nations.

We continue to impose tonnage dues upon ships entering our ports from foreign countries from which our vessels engaged in the coastwise trade are exempt.

The one hundredth anniversary of the signing of the treaty of Ghent is to be celebrated next year. For a century we have favored our coastwise shipping in respect to the charges imposed upon vessels entering our ports, with never a protest from England. She excluded all foreign ships from her coastwise trade until 1853, and persevered in the policy of relieving them of port dues which were exacted of foreign ships, even those engaged in the coastwise trade after they were admitted to it, until by the customs consolidation act of 1876 it was declared that foreign ships engaged in the coastwise trade should not be subject to higher rates than British ships.

The two countries have thus put a practical construction on the language of the treaty. The passage of ships from one port of the country to another being so peculiarly a matter of domestic concern, they were not deemed by either Government to be within the purview of the treaty. The policy of favoring coastwise shipping being so general, it could not have been deemed the purpose of either party to the contract to abandon it. The treaty was so interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States in the oft-cited case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332). A law of Texas imposed a pilotage charge upon all vessels entering the ports of that State save those engaged in the American coastwise trade. It was claimed that this statute was in contravention of the provision of the treaty with Great Britain above quoted. The Supreme Court declared there was no merit in the contention. Its views are expressed in the following brief paragraph:

Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply, without discrimination, to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will it embarrass the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it not a fact that the provisions of the treaty to which the Senator refers especially stipulate that the treaty itself shall be subordinate to all laws enacted by the United States and to all State laws?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, my attention has not been called to such a feature of the treaty, simply because the Supreme Court of the United States seemed to consider that if there were such a provision in the treaty it had no bearing at all upon the question presented to it for determination. Such a consideration is not even adverted to. The suggestion now made by the distinguished Senator is that the eminent counsel who argued that case before the Supreme Court of the United States and the learned judges who decided it overlooked this important provision now presented.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, is the Senator from Montana aware of the fact that this language appeared in the treaty of 1815:

The permission granted by this article is not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any part of the coasting trade of the said British territories—and that ships engaged in foreign trade and ships engaged in the coastwise trade were both mentioned in that treaty, and that in this particular treaty they are not mentioned?

Mr. WALSH. Of what consequence is it if such language is found there? It was not upon it that the decision of the court was based. It was reached as though there were none such. These are some late discoveries by some learned counsel, who now advise us that the Supreme Court of the United States overlooked the most important consideration when they decided the case of Olsen against Smith, as did also the counsel who prepared and argued the case. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment. I am not complaining about that, of course. England continued to exclude foreign nations from her coastwise trade, as I have said, until 1853, whether there was a provision or whether there was not a provision in the treaty; that is not the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. Just a moment. The proposition is, Mr. President, that she continued to impose higher duties and charges upon our vessels entering her ports, so far as they were permitted to enter her ports, than she charged British vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. Now, let us not get away from that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, my object was not to say that the Supreme Court decision was not put upon the right ground; it was not necessary for the Supreme Court to put it upon any other ground than it did, but the historical fact which ought to be kept in mind is that this treaty expressly said that the provisions of it did not apply so as to permit the United States vessels to engage in the coastwise trade of Great Britain, and the discriminations which Great Britain made in charges were discriminations in favor of the coastwise trade as against deep-sea commerce.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, of course the fact has now been brought to the attention of the Senate, and the pertinency of it in connection with the view of the Supreme Court of the United States will be best judged from the fact that the astute judges said nothing at all about it.

I am unable to perceive any reason why this case must not be considered as an authoritative determination, so far as our country and its citizens are concerned, of the question we are now considering. I have never heard or read that anyone doubted the soundness of the conclusion arrived at unanimously by the court. I have followed the debates in both Houses of Congress with some degree of care, and have yet to hear or read of any ground upon which it can be claimed reasonably to be inapplicable. It was said, indeed, that the court had simply held in that case that a classification for the purpose of fixing pilotage fees might be made, the one class embracing vessels engaged in the coastwise trade and the other those engaged in the over-seas trade. Quite true. But the same conditions that will permit putting coastwise vessels in one class, and saying that such class shall not be subject to the payment of pilotage fees, will permit a similar classification in respect to canal tolls. The classification is permitted in both cases because the foreign ship, not being entitled to engage in the coastwise trade, can not be discriminated against, whatever exemption from dues or charges is accorded to those ships which are.

It has been suggested also, in order to escape the conclusive force of the decision in Olsen against Smith, that pilotage, wharfage, harbor, and light dues are local exactions, petty in character, intended to meet expenditures necessary to permit commerce to exist, and that they are not included within the terms of the treaty of Ghent forbidding discrimination against British ships in respect to "charges" in any ports of the United States. But if such exactions are not "charges" within the meaning of the treaty, pray, what are? Are tonnage dues? Well, we levy tonnage dues on all ships coming into our ports from foreign countries, but impose none whatever on ships trading from one port to another of our own country. Great Britain might as well protest against this practice, in which she has acquiesced for a century, as to protest against exempting such ships from the payment of a tax or toll for passing through the canal. It is a highly significant circumstance, the importance of which can not be overestimated, that while in the note of Mr. Innes, the British chargé d'affaires, conveying the first protest of his Government concerning the legislation attacked as entailing national dishonor, the admission was substantially made that the United States had the right to exempt its coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls, no attention whatever was given in the more elaborate presentation of the general subject in the letter of Lord Grey to Ambassador Bryce to the very substantial grounds upon which it is claimed the exemption as to such can be justified, as elucidated repeatedly in this debate.

He urged, first, that unless all shipping is charged, the burden would be disproportionately heavy upon that of foreign countries; but this was answered by our State Department, that in fixing the tolls all tonnage likely to go through was considered, and that no heavier rates were fixed on account of the exemption, our Government concluding to bear the burden that would fall otherwise upon our coastwise shipping. He advanced as a second ground that "coastwise trade can not be circumscribed so completely that benefits conferred upon it will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade. To take an example: If cargo intended for a United States port beyond the canal, either from east or west, and shipped on board a foreign ship, could be sent to its destination more cheaply through the operation of the proposed exemption by being landed at a United States port before reaching the canal and then sent on as coastwise trade, shippers would benefit by adopting this course in preference to sending the goods direct to their destination through the canal on board the foreign ship."

But witnesses of the highest character, familiar with every detail of the shipping business, testified before the Senate committee that such a practice could not be pursued with profit, and that there was no likelihood that it would be followed. If it should be, it would be a simple matter to suppress it through an appropriate criminal statute.

As a third reason for alleging that the exemption is discriminatory, he suggested that American vessels not engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade would enjoy the exemption. Again, reliable witnesses tell us that few vessels which touch at ports along either shore will pass through the canal; that competition will compel steamers using the canal to make the most rapid voyage possible between their termini. The ships of the Panama Railroad Co. make direct voyages between New York and Colon. But this objection assumes that vessels not engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade will enjoy the exemption. Whether they will or not has not yet been decided; but if valid, the objection could be removed by an amendment of the act that would have no appreciable effect upon the volume of the traffic that would go through free.

OUR ATTITUDE HISTORICALLY CONSIDERED.

I recur now to consider some arguments that have been advanced, in a way collateral, to support the contention that we are not at liberty, consistently with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to exempt any of our vessels from the payment of tolls. It is said that the treaty in question must be construed in the light of history and in view of the repeated declarations of our statesmen. In this connection a long list of extracts from papers of public officials of high station is presented, each a declaration of a purpose to admit all the world to equal privileges with ourselves in the canal, to enjoy it on the same terms as we.

We should, indeed, have regard to the lessons of history, but we are more apt to fall into error than to be led to a just conclusion concerning the proper interpretation of a treaty made in 1901, in preparation for the construction of an American canal by American minds and American money, in response to an intense national sentiment that was jealous of any, even the least, participation by any foreign power in our control over it, if guided by what was said by our publicists when we were inviting the civilized world to join with us in the work, to share the sacrifices necessary to complete it, and to ally themselves with us for its operation, maintenance, defense, and neutralization.

The references usually commence with the instructions of Henry Clay to the representatives of the Panama Congress in 1826, and the following is quoted:

> If the work should ever be executed so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls.

In the interest of historical accuracy, as well as to set this statesman aright before this generation of his countrymen, it ought to be said that he did not have in contemplation a canal to be constructed by our Nation alone, for the language quoted was immediately preceded by this:

> What is to redound to the advantage of all America should be effected by common means and united exertions, and should not be left to the separate and unassisted efforts of any one power.

The Senate resolution of 1835 is given in part, but reading the whole it is disclosed that the President was instructed to open negotiations with "other nations" with a view to protecting by treaty stipulations any individuals or companies that might be induced to build the canal. A part of the following message of President Polk, sent to Congress in the year 1846, usually forms part of the collection, namely:

> The ultimate object, as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution (of March 3, 1835), to which I have already referred, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus. If the United States, as the chief of the American nations, should first become a party to this guaranty, it can not be doubted, indeed it is confidently expected by the Government of New Granada, that similar guaranties will be given to that Republic by Great Britain and France. * * * The interests of the world at stake are so important that the security of this passage between the two oceans can not be suffered to depend upon the wars and revolutions which may arise among different nations.
> Besides, such a guaranty is almost indispensable to the construction of a railroad or canal across the territory. Neither sovereign States nor individuals would expend their capital in the construction of these expensive works without some such security for their investments.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was framed in accordance with the then dominant idea of allying all the great commercial nations of the earth in raising the money to construct the canal and to maintain its neutrality. Very naturally, when all joined in the work, each contributing its just proportion, each obligating itself to protect and defend it, it would have been at once rapacious and ridiculous in us to entertain a purpose to have our ships go through the canal free while tolls were exacted of other nations contributing as much proportionately as we, or that ours should pass through the canal on any terms more favorable than theirs.

It will be well to bear in mind, too, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not provide that the ships of all nations should enjoy the privileges of the canal on terms of equality, but only the ships of such nations as might enter into treaty stipulations binding them in like manner as were the high contracting parties bound by that instrument. And even the famous eighth article did not stipulate that the canal should be open on equal terms to the citizens and subjects of every State, but only to the "citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

Neither the United States nor Great Britain at that time entertained any idea of building the canal, either jointly or severally, or even of endeavoring to induce capitalists to invest in such an enterprise on an undertaking with them alone to protect it and maintain its neutrality, and then have it thrown open to the world on the same terms as they themselves might prescribe or exact from the builder in return for their protection. They clearly declared their purpose to admit no nation to the advantages which they were to enjoy unless it would agree to join in affording the protection of which experience had shown such a waterway stood in dire need. The principle of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was that there should be equality among the nations under whose auspices the canal should be built, and which should engage to maintain its neutrality. The parties to that treaty were to be at liberty to deal with the other nations, assuming no burden, as they saw fit.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, on the contrary, contemplated that the United States alone should construct the canal or procure it to be done; that it alone should maintain and defend it and preserve its neutrality. It was not on the same footing as the other nations, making no sacrifice of either life or of treasure, temporary or permanent. The United States simply stipulated that she would treat them on terms of equality, all being equally meritorious—that is, having no merit except in the good will they bore us in the enterprise. It was a necessary corollary of the original plan of constructing the canal that it was not to be fortified. If the United States, England, France, and Germany should enter into a treaty or a series of treaties obligating themselves, as was contemplated by the Clayton-Bulwer convention, it would be dangerous as well as needless to fortify the canal. It was quite to be expected, accordingly, that a powerful sentiment should grow up against any military occupation of the territory it was to traverse. And this antagonism to any use of the canal for purposes of offense or defense in time of war, except the peaceful passage of ships, is frequently found intertwined with the idea of equality of tolls. Thus President Cleveland, in his message of 1885, is quoted to the effect that—

> Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit—a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chances of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition. * * *
> These suggestions may serve to emphasize what I have already said on the score of the necessity of a neutralization of any interoceanic transit, and this can only be accomplished by making the uses of the route open to all nations and subject to the ambitions and warlike necessities of none.

But the main idea thus expressed was utterly abandoned before the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was entered into. We had determined to build the canal ourselves, unaided by any nation, primarily for the purpose of national defense. When the first treaty came before the country there was a storm of disapproval because of the provision prohibiting fortifications. Yielding to the pressure of public opinion, the Senate adopted the Davis amendment, providing that the United States might, notwithstanding the treaty, take any steps which seemed to them wise for the defense of the Nation.

Much stress has been laid upon the views of Senator Davis, expressed in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, quite in harmony with those of President Cleveland above quoted, and affording support to the idea as well, that though we should construct the canal we ought to permit all nations to enjoy its advantages on terms of equality with ourselves, and particularly that we, like they, should be subject to tolls. But he argues persuasively in the report and on like grounds against fortifying the canal, and the treaty he reported favorably contained a provision against fortifications. He intended we should have no advantage over other nations in respect to the canal, either military or commercial. He did, indeed, report the amendment referred to, under which the United States was to be permitted to take any steps it saw fit for the national defense. Senator Morgan, however, in the minority report declared that such provision was at war with the idea of the neutrality of the canal.

Lord Lansdowne pointed out that a treaty containing two such obviously contradictory provisions would be too ambiguous for any use. The ideas of Senator Davis did not prevail. The temper of the country manifested itself so unmistakably that when the treaty again appeared the prohibition against fortifications was not in it. But this change was not accomplished without protest on this side. Ill-tempered comment was indulged in by that portion of the public press which somewhat instinctively, apparently, takes the side of Great Britain in these controversies as they arise from time to time. I shall detain the Senate to read from but one editorial, from a multitude of like character at my command, from the New York Times. It said:

> The contention that we must have the authority to pass our own ships while forbidding the passage of our enemy's is simply foolish. As a political demand it would never be granted by the nations of the world. As a point of strategy it would be futile, since no conceivable fortifications or means of defense which we might set up could be relied upon to protect the canal against effective obstruction by the enemy. We can well afford to take our chances in the time of war with the canal, since it will manifestly give us greater advantages than it will give our foe.

The New York Herald called the contention for a fortified canal a "snarling, dog-in-the-manger policy, petty and ridiculous in a nation which has attained the rank and dignity of this country."

The sentiment thus expressed did not dominate. A more patriotic purpose actuated the United States Senate, and the designs of those who would have left the canal open to seizure by her great navy in the unhappy event of a war with Great Britain were frustrated.

A tremendous change had ensued touching the relations the United States ought to bear to the canal after the Spanish-American War. That sentiment, excellently reflected in the Senate, forced out as well the provision of the earlier treaty whereby the rules for the "neutralization" of the canal were adopted by Great Britain and the United States and the article which contemplated that the other great powers should be invited to join in the treaty. It may here be remarked that the comments of both Mr. Hay and Mr. Choate are to be read in recognition of the fact that they were willing that this country should bind itself by the provisions of the original draft.

THE PREAMBLE.

Much persuasive force is claimed for that recital in the preamble of the treaty which declares the purpose of the parties to it to be to facilitate the construction of a canal "without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8" of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which general principle is said to give equality of terms to the citizens and subjects of all nations, including both Great Britain and the United States. I have shown that no such principle was either declared or established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It declared for the principle of equal terms to the citizens and subjects of all nations which should enter into an obligation to grant such protection to the canal as the two nations being parties to it bound themselves to afford. The citizens and subjects of other nations were subject to be dealt with as the powers controlling the canal might choose.

It will be borne in mind that the language of the treaty upon which reliance is placed forms no part of the covenants thereof. The most that can be claimed for it—all that can be claimed for it—is that it may be resorted to in order the more correctly to arrive at what the parties intended to express by the language they did use in that part of the treaty by which they did respectively obligate themselves. The preamble of a treaty or a statute may be resorted to for the purpose of clearing up any obscurity that may exist in the body of it. It serves the purpose of a guide to the doubtful or bewildered. But if it is itself as obscure as the instrument whose meaning it is intended to illuminate, it ceases to be of value as a guide. "The blind leading the blind" may reach the destination sought by both, but the chances of going astray are not measurably diminished.

What is that "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? It will be recalled, a fact heretofore adverted to, that the original treaty went back to England with one rule forbidding fortifications and another provision, proposed as an amendment by the Senate, that nothing in the treaty was to be construed to prevent the United States from taking any measures for the national defense. Touching this amendment the Marquis of Lansdowne said, in his letter to Lord Pauncefote, dated February 22, 1901:

> Even if it were more precisely worded it would be impossible to determine what might be the effect if one clause permitting defensive measures and another forbidding fortifications were allowed to stand side by side in the convention. To His Majesty's Government it seems, as I have already said, that the amendment might be construed as leaving it open to the United States at any moment, not only if war existed but even if it were anticipated, to take any measures, however stringent or far-reaching, which in their own judgment might be represented as suitable for the purpose of protecting their national interests. Such an enactment would strike at the very root of that "general principle" of neutralization upon which the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was based and which was reaffirmed in the convention as drafted.

The British minister of foreign affairs, in February, 1901, understood that the general principle of neutralization referred to in the preamble of the treaty, whose terms were then the subject of negotiation, had reference to the military occupation of the canal by the United States.

I have given you the words of his own letter. Now, let me introduce an important conversation he had about the same matter with our minister, Mr. Choate, as told in the letter of the latter, dated August 16, 1901:

> I called his attention to the fact that while the preamble of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty limits the object and subject of the treaty to the Nicaragua route, and the eighth article carefully avoids the use of the word "neutrality," but merely agrees to extend the "protection" of the two Governments to other routes, and that in granting such joint "protection" the understanding is that canals by other routes shall be open on equal terms to the subjects and citizens of the two nations and of every other State which is willing to grant the same "protection," all of which was extremely vague and uncertain, and omitted the "guaranty of neutrality," that wanting to get rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty altogether we shouldn't want to make any part of it by a new covenant stronger than it was before. Whereas his new article 3a makes the eighth article a great deal stronger than it was before, and saying nothing about "protection," which is, of course, inapplicable to a canal wholly American, fastens the rules of neutrality of article 3, which he calls "stringent rules" upon all future routes. He said he thought article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty clearly inferred neutrality. But I said it was only an inference—the word used was "protection."

Now, pray tell what that general principle is? Lansdowne says it is "neutrality," Choate says it is "protection." From his own letter it is apparent that when the minister said "neutrality" his mind dwelt on fortifications and defense. This is the important article 8:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications whether by canal or railway across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

It will be noticed it establishes no general principle, but recites that a general principle is established by the treaty, doubtless meaning the preceding provisions thereof. What was the principle? First, no fortifications; second, the union of all commercial nations by treaties to insure and maintain its neutral character; third, equal terms to all nations affording such protection.

The principle is wholly at war with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The recital in the preamble means nothing. It never was intended that it should have any force. Mr. Choate tells us all about it in his letter to Secretary Hay, of August 20, 1901, in which he says:

Lord Lansdowne's object in insisting upon article 3A is to be able to meet the objectors in Parliament by saying that although they have given up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty they have saved the "general principle," and have made it immediately effective and binding upon the United States as to all future routes and have dispensed with future "treaty stipulations" by making it much stronger than it was before.

We wanted the Clayton-Bulwer treaty abrogated. Lansdowne recognized the inestimable value the canal would be to Great Britain and did not desire to stand in the way. The recital might afford to allay partisan criticism of his action. It was put in for such use. It has no other significance and never was intended to have any other.

THE ALLEGED ANALOGY OF THE SUEZ CANAL CONVENTION.

It does not seem necessary to dwell upon the argument drawn from a supposed analogy between the Panama Canal and the Suez Canal, or from the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which refers to the rules which the United States, and the United States alone, "adopted" as the basis of the neutralization of the canal referred to as being "substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal."

That canal was constructed by a private corporation as a business enterprise in the expectation that it would yield a profit to the adventurers who constructed it and the stockholders who provided the funds or those who succeeded to their interests. Nine of the great nations of Europe united in the convention. Not one of them was a party to the work of construction. They agreed by the treaty of Constantinople to refrain in time of war from attacking or exercising any military control over it. They invited other nations to join them in the undertaking, to which they voluntarily became bound. The instrument bore a very close family resemblance to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Equality of tolls to all nations, without any exception, was a corollary of such an agreement among nations so situated.

THE BARD AMENDMENT.

With much confidence it is asserted that the action of the Senate on the Bard amendment to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty forbids the idea that we reserved the right under the second to exempt our coastwise vessels. Senator Bard proposed an amendment when the first treaty was under consideration, in the year 1900, as follows:

ART. 3. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

It was rejected by a vote of 27 to 43. Not a few of the Senators who voted against it now assert that they did so believing that the amendment was unnecessary—that the right might be exercised under the treaty as it stood. The author himself declares that such a sentiment prevailed quite generally, and that he desired to have the provision incorporated in the treaty to remove all doubt. Others who voted against it believed the treaty gave no such right, and desiring that our Government should claim no such right, voted as they did.

It is conceivable that every man who voted for the amendment did so not himself doubting that the treaty authorized the action taken but to forestall any claim that such right did not exist. Equally, every man who voted against it may have done so believing that the right so plainly existed under the treaty as it was framed that it was useless to burden it with a specific provision.

When the existing treaty was before the Senate for ratification Senator CULBERSON—who, I am very glad to say, is with us here to-day—proposed the following amendment:

It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

It was rejected by a vote of 15 to 62. By the course of reasoning the supporters of the pending measure pursue with reference to the Bard amendment we reach the conclusion that the true meaning of the refusal of the Senate to adopt that offered by Senator CULBERSON is that we abandoned and renounced all right to take any measures in conflict with rules 1, 2, 3, 4, or 5 of the treaty necessary to secure by our own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

The treaty having been considered in executive session, we have no record of what was said for or against the amendment by any Senator. Quite strangely we are told nothing, or very little at least, of what was said about it at the time, by those who were in a position to know. But if we were, the information would be no safe guide as to the significance of the action of the Senate.

The rejection of an amendment to a bill in the course of its passage, even when accompanied with a report of the debate, is so useless to a court in construing the act in which it eventuates that the circumstance is wholly disregarded. The very question here presented was considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association (166 U. S., 290). The inquiry before the court in that case was as to whether the Sherman Act interdicted combinations of railroad corporations or affected joint-traffic agreements between them.

The House amended the Senate bill in its passage, adding a provision making it unlawful to enter into any contract for the purpose of preventing competition in the transportation of persons or property. This amendment went out in the conference committee, and the bill was finally agreed to in the form in which it originally passed the Senate. The Supreme Court held that notwithstanding this history the act did extend to railroad consolidations and combinations, saying in the opinion:

Looking at the debates during the various times when the bill was before the Senate and House, both on its original passage by the Senate and upon the report from the conference committees, it is seen that various views were declared in regard to the legal import of the act. Some of the Members of the House wanted it placed beyond doubt or cavil that contracts in relation to the transportation of persons and property were included in the bill. Some thought the amendment unnecessary, as the language of the act already covered it, and some refused to vote for the amendment or for the bill if the amendments were adopted, on the ground that it would then interfere with the interstate-commerce act and tend to create confusion as to the meaning of each act. * * *

All that can be determined from the debates and reports is that various Members had various views, and we are left to determine the meaning of this act as we determine the meaning of other acts—from the language used therein.

There is, too, a general acquiescence in the doctrine that debates in Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body. United States v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. (91 U. S., 72, 79); Aldridge v. Williams (3 How., 9, 24; Taney, Chief Justice); Mitchell v. Great Works Milling & Manufacturing Co. (2 Story, 648, 653); Queen v. Hertford College (3 Q. B. D., 693, 707).

The reason is that it is impossible to determine with certainty what construction was put upon an act by the members of a legislative body that passed it by resorting to the speeches of individual members thereof. Those who did not speak may not have agreed with those who did, and those who spoke might differ from each other, the result being that the only proper way to construe a legislative act is from the language used in the act and, upon occasion, by a resort to the history of the times when it was passed.

The doctrine of that case was reasserted in Maxwell v. Dow (176 U. S., 581), in which the court said:

What individual Senators or Representatives may have urged in debate, in regard to the meaning to be given to a proposed constitutional amendment or bill or resolution, does not furnish a firm ground for its proper construction, nor is it important as explanatory of the grounds upon which the Members voted in adopting it. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association (166 U. S., 290, 318); Dunlap v. United States (173 U. S., 65, 75).

In case of a constitutional amendment it is of less materiality than in that of an ordinary bill or resolution. A constitutional amendment must be agreed to not only by Senators and Representatives but it must be ratified by the legislatures or by conventions in three-fourths of the States before such amendment can take effect.

It must not be forgotten that a treaty, like a constitutional amendment, must be ratified. It is interesting to know what our negotiators said, but the real question to determine is what the Senate of the United States, when it ratified the treaty, properly understood to be the meaning of the language used. It might, however, be said in passing that there is nothing in the correspondence which indicates that the questions here being considered were deoated or that they had the particular attention of the negotiators on either side. Their minds dwelt on the features of the treaty which affected the question of neutralization, as that word is commonly understood in international law, and those which related to the participation of other nations in the treaty.

The senior Senator from Massachusetts, who participated in the negotiations while they were in progress in London, is unable to tell us that he heard the specific questions which now perplex Congress discussed at all, and he has given to the Senate his opinion that we did not surrender the right to exempt our own shipping from the payment of tolls.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. GORE. It would be to some extent a matter of speculation, but I should like to have the Senator's opinion on one point. I should like to know if the Senator thinks Great Britain would have ratified the Hay-Pauncefote treaty if the Bard amendment had been adopted?

Mr. WALSH. I have already expressed my opinion that she would very gladly have done so; that considering the immense interests she had at stake and the tremendous advantage she must get from the construction of the canal and yielding nothing that she had to give, her desire to avoid being put in a dog-in-the-manger attitude would impel her to approve the treaty under any reasonable stipulations.

Mr. GORE. I was not present when the Senator discussed that point.

Mr. WALSH. That is my view of it.

THE WELLAND CANAL EPISODE.

There was no principle at issue or determined in the Welland Canal controversy that makes that episode helpful in the solution of the problem of our rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Great Britain agreed, so far as she could do so for Canada, that our citizens should have the use of canals in the Dominion on the same terms as its citizens. We agreed that the Canadians might have the use of ours on the same terms as our own people.

I regret very much that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who paid considerable attention to this subject the other day, is not here. An order was issued and enforced by the Canadian Government fixing the toll for the passage of all vessels through the Welland Canal at 20 cents per ton cargo. But in respect to grain destined to Montreal and points east a rebate of 18 cents was allowed. The result was to give a very decided preference to Canadian ports in the export trade. We protested vainly and eventually enacted retaliatory legislation, under the stress of which Canada yielded, though the British Government never admitted that the treaty had been violated. It was explicit in its terms. Each nation yielded something to the other. Canada had canals we wanted to use. We had similar waterways she desired to utilize. The controversy presented no question of the construction of the treaty.

There was no possibility of mistaking the countries to which the stipulations of the treaty applied. Canada and the United States were specifically named. It is not a little surprising that the incident should be referred to as shedding any light on the question as to whether the words "all nations" in the present treaty do or do not include the United States—whether ships engaged in the coastwise trade are or are not included within the designation "vessels of commerce" as used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

There was involved the question as to whether the "rebate" of the tolls was the equivalent of a subsidy, and whether the treaty forbade the granting of a subsidy equal to the tolls. But the diplomatic correspondence discussed neither of these questions. No declaration on either side has been cited to illumine the dark places in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, because none was made that can so serve us. Reference to it in this discussion to support the justice of the repeal suggests a desperate cause.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. WEST. I noticed that the other day in the debate before the Senate it seemed to be a mooted question as to whether this rebate going to the Canadian side was allowed only to Canadian vessels or whether it included all vessels.

Mr. WALSH. No; it was allowed to all vessels. It was intended to make the Canadian ports preferable for export business over the American ports.

CONCLUSION ON TREATY RIGHTS.

I can not accept the view that, having spent $400,000,000 in the construction of this great work, having made a contribution to the commerce of the world, to the happiness of mankind more stupendous than any other of which history tells, we may not pass our own ships through it on voyages from one port to another of our own country on such terms as our Government may see fit to impose.

And I am loathe to believe, except as the formal protest lodged with the State Department forces me to, that any nation enjoying the use of the canal upon just and reasonable charges, and without favoritism to any other, would prove so unappreciative of our sacrifices and our beneficence as to object to any course we might care to pursue in that behalf.

Nor am I able to perceive that the treaty is to have any different interpretation because it contemplated that the canal might be constructed by a private corporation, a portion of whose stock our Government would buy or which might be aided by a grant or subsidy. It is a matter of history that the United States was itself going to undertake the work. The treaty implies that it was to exercise such control, at least, over the work as that it could require any individual or association who did build it to exact no more than just and reasonable fees, uniform to all nations. If it became a mere stockholder, it, of course, could have no special privileges. The other stockholders could complain. It would be unnecessary for foreign nations to do so. If it was not a stockholder, it might make any kind of a contract, under which it would obtain concessions for its shipping, public and private, as a consideration for the aid it might extend.

THE ALLEGED CONFLICT SHOULD BE SUBMITTED TO THE SUPREME COURT.

Whenever differences of opinion exist in this country touching the construction of acts of Congress or their harmony with the Constitution we look with confidence and hope, if the question be one of great national concern, to an adjudication of them by the Supreme Court of the United States. That tribunal occupies a unique place, not only in the esteem of our own people, but in the regard of the jurists of the world. It passes judgment on controversies between sovereign States and interprets and applies the principles of international law. It would be most fortunate if, in the uncertainties that surround the rights we enjoy in respect to the extent of control we may exercise over the Panama Canal in view of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we could be guided by the clear light of a direct decision by that court.

No arbitral tribunal that could be assembled would be hedged about by so many guaranties of impartiality in its judgment. It must defend the conclusion at which it arrives before the world. It has a stainless record of a century and a quarter to maintain. The division of opinion in our country, both with respect to the correct interpretation of the treaty and the economic wisdom of the law, affords a further guaranty of judicial fairness in its consideration of any question which might come before it touching the true intent of the parties to the treaty as expressed in the language they used.

In view of the differences which have prevailed it is, in my judgment, to be regretted that the law was not so framed as to invite a determination of the basic inquiry as to our rights under the treaty. It is not yet too late. I am convinced that the views of the Supreme Court would be accepted by a waiting world as a settlement of the question which, disguise it as we may, is the question in this debate. But if its determination should not be so accepted, it would, at least, unite our own people. If adverse to our right, consistently with the treaty to grant the exemption which the canal act extends, the Congress would hasten to repeal the offending clause. If the right should be sustained our Government would have back of it a united people in any diplomatic conference that might endeavor to adjust the differences to which the varying views of the treaty have given rise.

The Executive ought not to find it difficult to satisfy importunate foreign ministers by the assurance that he was diligently seeking to obtain the advice of the highest tribunal of the land with respect to the correct interpretation of the treaty on which he, unfortunately, found himself at variance with his immediate predecessor, a lawyer of profound learning, a judge of experience and discernment.

If Senators who are advocating the passage of the pending bill do not dread the decision of the Supreme Court, I may with some confidence ask their support of an amendment offered by me, originally proposed by former President Taft, which I ask be now read from the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof:

That section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, be, and the same hereby is, amended by the addition thereto of the following provision, namely:

That nothing contained in the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," shall be deemed to repeal any provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or to affect the judicial construction thereof, or in anywise to impair any rights or privileges which have been or may be acquired by any foreign nation under the treaties of the United States relative to tolls or other charges for the passage of vessels through the Panama Canal, and that when any alien, whether natural person, partnership, company, or corporation, considers that the charging of tolls or the enforcement of any other regulation under and pursuant to the provisions of this act violates in any way any such treaty rights or privileges, such alien shall have the right to bring an action against the United States for a redress of the injury which he considers himself to have suffered, and the district courts of the United States are hereby given jurisdiction to hear and determine such cases and to decree the appropriate relief, and from the decision of such district courts there shall be an appeal by either party to the action to the Supreme Court of the United States.

THE QUESTION IN ITS ECONOMIC ASPECT.

Mr. WALSH. I am convinced that the predecessor of the present President was right in the view he took, and which he supported in a vigorous opinion that the treaty is not violated by the canal act. Richard Olney, Attorney General and Secretary of State under President Cleveland, equally eminent as a jurist, holds the same view. Hannis Taylor, a recognized authority on constitutional and international law in Europe and America, argues convincingly to the same conclusion. Mr. Taft's Attorney General, George W. Wickersham; his Secretary of State, P. C. Knox; and Charles Bonaparte, Attorney General under Mr. Roosevelt, all concur in this view. It is significant that the present Attorney General has expressed no opinion to the contrary.

A diligent study of the subject has convinced me that we have the right to exempt our coastwise shipping. Were it an open question much might be said on the wisdom of the policy of giving this concession to our coastwise shipping in addition to the monopoly it now enjoys. It must be borne in mind that the great economic consideration inducing the building of the canal was the desire to secure water competition to moderate the exactions of the transcontinental railroads. Any burden laid on our coastwise shipping makes that competition just so much easier for the railroads. It is not a secret at all that they look with the gravest apprehension to the diversion to the sea route of a tremendous tonnage now crossing the continent by rail.

In a speech delivered at Lincoln, Nebr., in the year 1907, Mr. S. W. Hill declared the construction of the canal to be the "monumental folly of the age."

The antagonism of the interests for which Mr. Hill spoke to the building of the canal at all is by no means a figment arising out of the murky atmosphere of political controversy. In the North American Review for February, 1898, will be found a most eloquent and powerful essay, written frankly in the interest of the transcontinental railways, condemning the policy of constructing an isthmian canal at all.

The Canadian transcontinental lines will be required to meet the competition which shipping utilizing the canal will develop. The Dominion Government, as is well known, is interested in those roads to the extent of a half a billion. Even under present conditions it is confidently asserted that the building of railroads in Canadian territory has been overdone and that the lines running to the coast must face a deficit when the third now in course of construction is completed. The cause of England's solicitude about the imposition of tolls upon our coastwise shipping, though her vessels can not participate in the trade, is not obscure. There is every reason why she should make common cause with the transcontinental railroads traversing our territory to burden traffic by way of the canal.

Having reached the conclusion that the national honor is in no way involved, that we have a perfect right under the treaty to exempt our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls, there remains the question as to whether we ought to exercise that right. The wisdom of that policy is fairly debatable, though to fail to exercise it is so obviously in the interest of the railroads, to moderate whose exactions was one of the prime reasons for building the canal at all, that one may wisely read with some distrust the arguments advanced against it.

THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

For myself, however, I do not feel at liberty to enter upon any consideration of the wisdom of the policy proposed. The Democratic platform has declared the policy of the Democratic Party on that subject. I went before the people upon it, was elected pledged to carry out its mandate whatever my individual convictions might be. I shall indulge in no reflections upon the obligation which a platform imposes upon a party candidate. I have in the most solemn manner asserted its sacred character in season and out of season—time out of mind. I have asked publicly the condemnation of our people upon those who treated it lightly.

Senators have warned their party associates of the wrath that will be visited upon the Democratic Party for a wanton violation of the platform pledges upon which it came into power. I do not dread so much the vengeance of the people against the party of which I am a humble follower as I do the distrust that will be bred by such an open repudiation of a solemn covenant touching the promises of all political parties and incidentally of representative government. Were it proposed by any man other than the President of the United States, holding the high place he does in the confidence and affections of the people, we should all recoil from it with horror. For myself its moral aspect assumes no different hue because he commends it.

My relationship to the Baltimore platform is too intimate to permit me with an easy conscience to escape the fetters it places upon my official action, even though I did not concur altogether in any particular policy it announces. It says:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

And again:

Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

Some curiosity has been evinced concerning the circumstances attending the adoption of the plank first mentioned, and since I enjoyed special opportunity to know of them and no reason appears why publicity should not now be given to them, I may be pardoned for relating what transpired. It has been intimated, rather than charged, that its appearance in the platform was surreptitious or that it found its way therein without the particular attention of the committee. Let the narration disclose the fact. The platform committee was constituted, as usual, of one member from each State designated by the delegation. It organized by the election of the Senator from Indiana as chairman and the present historian as secretary. After listening to those who desired to be heard and indulging in some general discussion, a committee of 11 was, on motion, appointed by the chair to make a draft of a platform. The committee consisted of James P. Clarke, Arkansas; John W. Kern, Indiana; Isador Rayner, Maryland; James K. Vardaman, Mississippi; D. J. Walsh, Massachusetts; W. J. Bryan, Nebraska; J. A. O'Gorman, New York; Atlee Pomerene, Ohio; Benjamin R. Tillman, South Carolina; Charles A. Culberson, Texas; and Thomas Martin, Virginia.

It proceeded to the work assigned to it, and in a general way determined upon the propositions which were to find a place in the draft to be submitted. It agreed further on the language in which its views were to be expressed in the case of many of the planks, including the one in question. Finally, for the purpose of expedition, the work of putting into appropriate language the ideas to which general acquiescence had been given was reposed in Mr. Bryan, of Nebraska, and Mr. O'GORMAN, a delegate from New York, who were authorized to call to their aid such members of the committee as they chose. They requested Senator POMERENE and myself to remain with them. The draft prepared or assembled by this committee of the subcommittee being transcribed under my own personal supervision, was read to the subcommittee and by it reported to the entire committee before which it was again read, and, being by it approved, was presented to and adopted by the convention without change.

With some levity an inquiry was addressed at an early stage of this debate to the junior Senator from New York as to whether he did not present the plank in question to the committee. Of what consequence is it who presented it? In the construction of political platforms planks are usually tendered by members who take an interest in the subject with which they deal. The delegate from Alaska tendered a plank relating to that Territory. I offered the plank declaring the policy of the party touching the public lands and the disposition of the natural resources associated with them. The plank referring to canal tolls was, as my memory serves me, tendered by the Senator from New York and was adopted by the subcommittee of 11 before the smaller committee assumed the task imposed upon it. There was no debate upon it, simply because it was generally approved or acquiesced in. There was no debate as to whether a declaration should be made favoring a reduction in tariff duties. Two circumstances, however, have fastened themselves upon my mind, indicating that the plank in question had the particular attention of the committee aside from such as was necessarily given it in the reading of the completed work.

When it was presented, Mr. Bryan expressed his approval, but said that it should be accompanied by another plank declaring against the admission of railroad-owned ships to the canal. And so the platform reads, after the declaration concerning tolls:

We also—

Note the "also"— favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

The draft tendered used the expression "free tolls," which had acquired a place in the literature of the subject, and which has been used frequently on this floor in the present debate. Some one suggested that the two words were contradictory of each other and the expression of doubtful propriety from a literary point of view. It was changed to read as we find it:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

SHIP SUBSIDY.

I make no criticism of the course other men may take who are convinced that the law in question violates our treaty obligations. It is their duty to vote for its repeal, or at least for a diplomatic conference to adjust any differences that may arise with any foreign government in consequence of it. If it should be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States that the act in question is in contravention of the treaty, or if I were satisfied that it is, I should feel my oath of office the superior obligation, and would unhesitatingly vote for repeal. While I remain convinced that no treaty restrains our action, I am under no temptation to escape from the trammels of the platform upon the puerile suggestion that the plank in question is contradicted by another that declares against subsidies, requiring a choice as between the two. Neither am I disposed to listen with any patience to the view that the obnoxious plank is contrary to the time-honored principle of the Democratic Party against a subsidy. I have no disposition to expose myself to the disrespect of any man who gives thought to the subject at all by advancing any such preposterous argument. Why, in that view the canal itself is a subsidy to the shipping interest. Why did we spend $400,000,000 to build it except to aid the shipping interest, hoping eventually to get the money back in reduced freight rates and increased commerce? Whether the tolls-exemption clause is repealed or not, the interest on the bonds and the expense of management, operation, defense, and upkeep will amount to more than $10,000,000 annually. So if tolls exemption be a subsidy, we are going to continue subsidizing shipping, whatever be the fate of the pending bill. If the term "subsidy" is applicable to the case at all, the question is not whether we shall subsidize carriers by water, but whether we shall subsidize the coastwise carriers more than we do the rest. We have put millions into the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, and charge nothing to any vessels for its use. If we repeal the exemption clause of the Panama act because it constitutes a ship subsidy obnoxious to the Democratic platform and time-honored Democratic principles, we must impose tolls upon the shipping passing through the Soo, giving the competing railroad lines an opportunity to raise their grain rates to the Atlantic seaboard by the amount of the exaction upon grain-carrying vessels out of Duluth. We appropriate millions annually for the improvement of rivers and harbors. We must desist because we are subsidizing the shipping interests which make use of these improvements free, as will our coastwise shipping under the act that has recently evoked so much hue and cry about subsidy.

As if these considerations did not make the proposition sufficiently ridiculous, the tariff act, in which we all take so much pride, contains a provision under which goods brought to our ports in American bottoms enter at a rate of duty 5 per cent less than those specified in the various schedules. The result to the Government is exactly the same as though the nominal rate were exacted and then a payment of 5 per cent of the amount of the duty collected made to the American shipowner. In a sense, though by no means in any exact sense, this is a subsidy—quite as near being a subsidy as is the exemption granted by the canal act to coastwise shipping. Yet the Democratic committees of both Houses conceived the idea, the Democratic caucuses of both Houses approved of it, the Democratic Members of both Houses voted for it, and the Democratic President gave it his sanction in signing the historic measure of which it is a part. Let us not invite the imputation of hypocrisy by shouting "subsidy." That kind of subsidy is as old as our Government. It has the approval of Jefferson and every Democratic administration down to Jackson's time. The First Congress, which convened in 1789, gave a preference to American ships by fixing the rate of duty on imports brought in by them at 10 per cent less than those entering in foreign vessels. A similar act was approved by the Father of Democracy in 1804.

Whether in reason there is any just distinction between a straight-out subsidy—the gift of money outright to shipping, the payment of such to American vessels out of the Treasury from the funds contributed by the people as taxes—and the omission to collect dues from some or all of them which are exacted of foreign ships or on goods brought into our ports in foreign ships, we have made a distinction in our legislation and in our policy. He flouts the testimony of history who says that the record of the Democratic Party is against subsidies of the kind first mentioned, if they be so denominated properly. Its record of opposition to the other form of aid to shipping is consistent and determined. It was against such largesses that the plank of the platform which refers to subsidies was leveled. The platform is to be read as though it were written:

We believe in fostering by constitutional regulation of commerce the growth of a merchant marine * * * but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

But—

We favor the adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for the development and improvement of our inland waterways with economy and efficiency, so as to permit their navigation by vessels of standard draft.

And—

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

There is here no contradiction. If the word "subsidies" used in the plank first above quoted is broad enough to include aids to shipping, referred to in the two others, it is to be regarded as narrowed in its significance as there employed so as not to embrace them.

One of the grandest tasks that can engage the constructive statesmanship and the engineering talent of our day is the improvement of the navigation of our rivers in the effort to make them as serviceable as highways as are those of Germany. We are commanded by the second plank of the three above quoted to promote the inauguration of that great work; and we shall invite our domestic shipping to make use of it without price, just as we do now concerning the Panama Canal.

There may be some good reason why we should charge tolls of our coastwise shipping using that waterway; but in Heaven's name, let us boldly proclaim it. The subsidy talk will not fool anybody, even though we were base enough to attempt it. To my mind exemption from tolls for passage through a canal to our own ships engaged in competition with railroads in the transportation of goods from one section of the country to another, primarily to reduce the cost of carriage to our people, is easily distinguishable from an appropriation of money out of the Treasury to ships plying to and from foreign ports across seas that are open to all mankind. We do not reduce transcontinental rates by granting subsidies to the latter. The State of New York is spending $40,000,000 in enlarging the Erie Canal, the use of which has since 1882 been free to all American vessels. The exactions of the railroads, overburdened with traffic, was diverting American trade to Canadian ports. What would be thought of one who should denounce the expenditure it is making as a subsidy to the shipping interest? Would he not subject himself to suspicion of being a secret advocate of the rival railroad interests?

SHIPPING TRUST.

Of a piece with the talk about subsidy is the appeal to popular prejudice by ascribing to some mythical "shipping trust" the enjoyment of the advantages accruing from the existing act.

What is this "shipping trust" which is to send its vessels through the Panama Canal from our ports on the Atlantic to our ports on the Pacific? Who is at the head of it? By what name is it known? What is the nature of its organization? Reference is made to the report of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to the effect that 92 per cent of the coastwise shipping is controlled either by railroads or by combinations of one kind or another, the fact being that it referred entirely to line steamers and not to tramps at all. How much of that 92 per cent will go through the canal? It includes the greater part of the shipping on the Great Lakes. It includes the barges and ferries that connect the railroad termini at Jersey City with New York. It includes the craft that carry railroad cars between the Virginia Capes. It includes the Southern Pacific steamers that ply between New Orleans and New York. Why particularize further? There are, according to Prof. Emory R. Johnson, who gives facts here, not opinions, now in existence steamers that are likely to make use of the canal in the coastwise trade, 24 of the American Hawaiian Line; 3 of the Grace Line; and 6 belonging to the United States, operated by the Isthmian Canal Commission or the Panama Railroad Co. That is all that will engage in the general trade. There are besides 44 tank steamers, fitted only for carrying oil; and 32 tramps. If any other ships enter into the coastwise trade through the canal, they must be built or taken out of the service in which they are now employed, presumably profitably.

Talk of a "shipping trust" in this connection may pass upon the hustings or in the rural press, but indulgence in it in this body does not add to the dignity of the discussion nor to the enlightenment it may afford.

WILL TRANSCONTINENTAL RATES BE REDUCED?

It is said, however, that in any case the concession is in the nature of a gratuity to the shipping interest, and that no reduction in freight rates is to be expected in consequence of it, because the shipowners will combine and establish rates just enough below the railroad rates to attract the business.

It is marvelous that any thoughtful man should seriously make such a monstrous assertion. Why did we build the canal at all? If we can get no more favorable rates by water than by rail we might as well, save for the value it has from a military point of view, have kept in the Treasury the $400,000,000 the canal cost us. If any such rates could be maintained, new figures, beyond anything the poets or romanticists have yet furnished us, would have to be invented to describe the wealth that awaits those who engage in the trade. The coast-to-coast rate by rail on low-grade freight like lumber is about $24. Sugar is now transported from Honolulu to New York by rail across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec at $9 a ton, including all costs of transshipment, $6 of which go to the ships. This trade will hereafter go through the canal at a rate not to exceed $7, assuming that no tolls are paid. The present all-rail rate from San Francisco to New York is $19.

The present $9 rate on sugar is not made to meet railroad competition at $19. It is established because of the necessity arising from the competition of Cuban sugar and potential competition from Europe in the New York market.

Common lumber will be carried from Seattle to Boston by the canal at from $6 to $9 a thousand not to meet railroad competition at $24 a thousand, for obviously the traffic will stand no such rate. So far as the ordinary grades are concerned, the rate found in the schedule is a "paper rate." The low figure given must prevail in order to meet competition from the forests of the South and Southeast. The rate must be less than $10 or the ships can get no cargoes.

Mr. LANE. I will say, for the Senator's information, if he will allow me, that a charter has just been made from British Columbia for a ship load at $6, with tolls paid.

Mr. WALSH. I placed the figures at from $6 to $9.

If any attempt at any such extortion as some people profess to fear were made, the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission could be extended over traffic of that character. It would not be necessary, however, as the enormous profits would soon attract to the business ships in such numbers as to render any combination impossible or ineffective. But the idea that ocean freights are or can be fixed at unreasonable figures by combination, or that there is no competition among ocean carriers, inveterate though it be, has no foundation. That the regular lines enter into agreements is indisputable, but they are always in peril of the tramps and particularly of those sailing under a charter. Witnesses on both sides of this controversy, whose familiarity with the subject compels us to accept their testimony, attest to this fact. It will not, I am sure, be regarded as invidious in me to say that among the witnesses who appeared before the Senate committee which considered the pending bill, none was better equipped to enlighten and none proved so helpful as Mr. E. H. Outerbridge, who came as a representative of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of New York to urge the repeal of the exemption clause. His vast experience as an importer and exporter entitled him to speak with confidence touching nearly every phase of the shipping business. What he says concerning it is entitled to the most respectful consideration. Let me quote:

I know of no line of business in which the competition is more terrific than it is in the transporting of freight on the water. The ocean lane is open to everybody, and it is by the efficiency of your management, and the way you treat your foreign consignees and your shippers that you hold your business together, and then by that means drive off the oppositions that are continually coming on the line.

I have two brothers who are in the steamship business in New York. They have been in it for 40 years and are still in it successfully, and there has never been a five-year period in the whole of the time that they have not had the most terrific kind of opposition, from one company after another, because those people believed they were running a profitable venture. And they have only been able to live, first of all, by the extremely fair treatment to their clientele, so that they always had their shippers and consignees more friendly to them than anybody else; and, secondly, by the extreme efficiency with which they operated and developed the business.

And again:

As a rule each tramp ship is a company herself. There are some individual firms abroad that own a large number of so-called tramp steamers that run all over indiscriminately, picking up business where they can, but the majority of tramp steamers are owned in sixty-fourth shares, and each ship is a company in herself. * * *

Senator BRISTOW. The tramp ships, then, are not in any of these combinations to maintain rates?

Mr. OUTERBRIDGE. None whatever, and they outnumber in number and tonnage all that are in any combinations many times.

Senator BRISTOW. What proportion of the commerce of the world—that is, the marine commerce—is carried by tramps and by liners; that is, the tonnage, the freight?

Mr. OUTERBRIDGE. I could only hazard a guess; but I should hazard a guess that certainly 85 per cent of the tonnage of the world is carried in tramps and 15 per cent in liners, so called.

Senator BRISTOW. You say the competition between these vessels is very severe; that they contend for business against each other—these tramp ships?

Mr. OUTERBRIDGE. Most extraordinarily so. If you could get a few of our ship brokers down here, they could give you a great deal of information on that score. I do not know any other business that there is more run after and a keener solicitation for business than in the freight business except, perhaps, the advertising business.

Senator WALSH. Is wheat and flour carried abroad in tramp ships generally, or line steamers?

Mr. OUTERBRIDGE. Tramp ships almost altogether. Formerly liners carried some for ballast. They used to present the owner with a chromo if he carried wheat for ballast. That day has passed and grain is carried almost exclusively in tramp ships.

The economic phase of the inquiry as viewed by the Pacific coast interests was ably presented by W. R. Wheeler, of San Francisco, and Joseph N. Teal, of Portland, who urged the preservation of the existing law. They have the same story to tell of competition among water carriers. I quote briefly from the testimony of Mr. Teal:

Senator WALSH. What proportion of the traffic out of your port goes in the line steamers and what in the tramp steamers?

Mr. TEAL. All the lumber. We are the largest lumber-shipping port in the United States, and all the lumber goes out in tramps. On the domestic tonnage, south and north bound, the rates are very low. I should think the most of it of every kind goes in tramps, unless it might be the actual merchandise shipped between San Francisco and Portland.

Senator WALSH. To what extent is there competition among the tramps?

Mr. TEAL. There is necessarily continuous competition among the tramps.

Senator WALSH. Do they not unite in conferences?

Mr. TEAL. They do try to, but they simply can not. There are too many of them. * * * To give an idea of how those water rates vary on the tramps, in 1912 there was grain shipped to Japan on tramp steamers on the basis of $1.50 a ton. That was on English tramps that wanted to go over there and wanted to have something to get there with.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. HUGHES. I simply ask for information. I notice that this testimony refers to tramp ships. Do I understand that tramp ships engage in the coastwise trade?

Mr. WALSH. Why, unquestionably. That is what Mr. Teal tells you. There is an enormous lumber business between Portland and Los Angeles and San Diego, for instance, and all of that lumber is carried in tramp ships.

With competition between the carriers by water, such as the testimony of witnesses on both sides of the controversy which now agitates the Senate discloses to exist, the advantage of the exemption given by the act will very largely accrue to the consumer and the producer within our own country in reduced freight rates. If competition does not force a reduction to the point at which no more than a reasonable profit will be returned to the ships using the canal in the coastwise trade, the Interstate Commerce Commission can, under appropriate legislation, force the reduction.

Disguise it as you may, every dollar paid by vessels transporting freight through the canal from one of our ports to another is a tax upon the people of the country, since they are required to make it up to the vessel owner in the increased freights he is obliged to exact in consequence. The Democratic Party has taught the people of this country that the tariff is a tax—a tax ultimately paid by the consumer. The tolls paid to the Government officer at the canal is no less a tax than the duties paid to the customs officer at the port. Two vessels enter the port of San Francisco carrying cargoes consisting of steel and the manufactures thereof, the one sailing from Liverpool, the other from Philadelphia. The former pays tolls and it pays duties upon its cargo; the latter pays tolls only. In both instances the tolls are paid in the last analysis by the consumer. The tolls are a tax. I am for lifting that tax.

Mr. President, there is a phase of this question on its economic side so magnificently large, opening up so inviting a field for the exercise of such statesmanship as this body can command, that I can not refrain from alluding to it in brief in this connection.

It is estimated that 2,000,000 tons of freight now transported from coast to coast by rail will be diverted to the all-water route by the canal, at a saving of about $10 per ton. This means that $20,000,000 annually will be left with the people on the coasts and those near enough to them to experience the immediate effects of the change, which amount will be available for investment in enterprises that will produce still more tonnage. The loss of this revenue is a matter of the most serious concern to the transcontinental railroads and not without its importance upon their future. I am not apprehensive, however, that there will not be full compensation in increased business eventually growing out of the saving effected.

But let me ask you to reflect for a moment upon the vast traffic that will arise that now has no existence at all—that will be handled through the canal without any loss whatever to the railroads. About 70 per cent of the lumber cut on the coast is of such low grade that it can not stand shipment by rail to the eastern markets. Such of it as can not be disposed of locally is allowed to rot in the yards in which it is stacked. A 5,000-ton ship will pay $6,000 tolls one way through the canal. The lumber mills of the coast would be delighted to provide the consumers in the East with lumber at such a price as would return $6,000 per shipload. It is doubtful whether that character of commodity can move at all if tolls are exacted. In any case it will move inland from Atlantic ports just so much farther if no tolls are paid than it will if tolls are paid as the amount of the tolls represents in railroad mileage. Whatever does move is so much more added to the world's wealth. That which to-day was valueless to-morrow becomes a source of national riches. It is estimated that 1,000,000,000 feet of that lumber can annually find its way into the eastern markets. California oils may be made available in the manufacturing centers as a source of power in competition with coal. It must move, if it moves at all, on a margin of profit not to exceed ordinarily the amount of the tolls. Under favorable conditions 25,000,000 barrels annually will come east. The natural deposits of borax, soda, potash, and other like nonmetallic minerals of California and adjacent States will crowd out of the Atlantic seaboard markets the manufactured article largely imported from Europe. California asphalt will come into competition with the products of Trinidad. All these varieties of low-grade freight must be sold, if sold at all, upon the very slightest margin above actual cost.

The industries in which they are produced will come into existence or thrive very largely as we shall determine the question which the present bill presents to us for solution. The tonnage they will furnish is demonstrably enormous.

Some years ago a distinguished scientist associated with Harvard University launched in my State a project to extract by the dredging process the placer gold in vast beds of auriferous gravel, the rich cores of which had been mined in the pioneer days. The remainder of the ground had been abandoned as worthless. A dredge was built and operated by steam power, coal being used for fuel, but the expenses of operation were so great that the enterprise was about to die when the development of a hydroelectric plant a distance of about 30 miles away afforded an opportunity to obtain a cheaper power. Five giant dredges are now eating their way through the deposit, which gives up millions every year, the difference in the cost of power making the industry possible and the ground productive where before it was barren.

It has been sagely said that the man merits the honor of his country who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before. If by omitting to tax we can make the earth yield in abundance where before it was fruitless, we shall have earned the approbation of our consciences and the plaudits of our countrymen. The opportunity comes to us rarely. It is here now.

Do not deceive yourselves, my associates on this side of the Chamber, who purpose voting for this bill. There is no ground upon which you can justify your action to an American constituency or to yourselves except that the act you wipe away is a violation of our treaty obligations.

The American people are jealous of the national honor, scrupulous in yielding to every demand to which they have been bound, either by treaty or the laws of nations, but quick to resent the assertion of right against their country by any foreign power for which neither affords sufficient justification.

If there were in the present situation any apparent peril of a foreign war or any profound disturbance in our foreign relations distinctly traceable to the act in question, I might find some excuse for departing from the course to which the line of thought I have pursued points. That some friction has arisen in consequence of the controversy, I entertain no doubt. That the view obtains generally in Europe that we are wrong in our interpretation of the treaty may be true. It would be strange if it were otherwise, when the President of our country says we are. I can not escape the conviction that had he boldly asserted what both of his predecessors proclaimed a very much more general acceptance of that doctrine would obtain. But it is idle to think that England will go to war with us about such a matter, and no one else has any treaty with us nor any right to complain. Indeed, it is not advanced in any quarter that Great Britain thinks of our action in this matter as affording any justification for war. She needs our good will, just as we are glad to have hers. It is unfortunate that we are ourselves divided in opinion upon the interpretation that should be given to the treaty. If the substitute offered by me is adopted, the true meaning will be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States. That ought to satisfy all mankind. In view of the divergence of opinion here—all parties dividing on it—a perfectly impartial judgment would be assured. But if it did not resolve the doubts of the other nations, it would at least solidify opinion at home. If the President's view should be sustained, all our citizens would acquiesce. The act would be promptly repealed. Indeed, the decision would terminate it. If the opposite conclusion should be reached, as I entertain no doubt it will be, the question would be still before us, but solely upon the economic aspects which it presents. What Democrat would then venture to vote upon it in contravention of the platform of his party?

CONGRESS OF MUSICAL SCIENCE AND HISTORY (H. DOC. NO. 978).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of a provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "thereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law," I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress, and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of the French Republic to that of the United States to send delegates to an International Congress of Musical Science and History, to be held at Paris in June next, and a letter from the Librarian of Congress, showing the favor with which he views the proposed gathering.

It will be observed that the acceptance of this invitation involves no appropriation of public moneys.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 16, 1914.

UNVEILING OF STATUE OF COMMODORE BARRY.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, out of respect to the memory of the great Revolutionary patriot, Commodore John Barry, and to enable Senators to attend the exercises this afternoon attendant upon the unveiling of the monument to his memory, I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 18, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 16, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, eternal God our heavenly Father, that our Republic is not unmindful of the men who rendered valiant and patriotic service in the cause of freedom; that to-day a monument will be unveiled in this city to the memory of Commodore John Barry, whose courage, bravery, and fortitude gave strength to the holy cause. May it ever stand an inspiration to the defenders of popular government in peace or in war, and everlasting praise be Thine. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I see that the Journal is so journalized as to show that the House stands adjourned at the close of the consideration of the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill and not later than half past 2 o'clock. While it is true that the Speaker stated the question that way, I question whether that was a part of the request. I think it was only an announcement. The House might want to do some informal business after the consideration of the bill was closed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is correct. It is surplusage, and the Journal will be corrected.

The Journal was approved.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I see that the gentleman from Missouri is not here. I suppose he intended to proceed with House resolution 256.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understood that this morning the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] desired to go on with the Consular and Diplomatic bill.

Mr. MANN. Instead of taking up House resolution 256?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15762, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment that was pending when the committee rose on yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, strike out lines 4 to 14, both inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Pan American Union, $75,000: Provided, That any moneys received from the other American Republics for the support of the union shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit, in addition to the appropriation, and may be drawn therefrom upon requisitions of the chairman of the governing board of the union for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the union and of carrying out the orders of said governing board: And provided further, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print an edition of the Monthly Bulletin, not to exceed 6,000 copies per month, for distribution by the union during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I see by a Washington paper this morning that the Director General of the Pan American Union has condescended to make an application to become a member of the Chamber of Commerce of the District of Columbia in order that he may be better able to present the importance of the case of the Pan American Union, and I was rather wondering whether the application for membership and the payment of six months' dues was to be at the expense of the fund which is now in process of being appropriated. Perhaps the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations may be able to tell us something about it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman from Illinois hardly asks that question seriously.

Mr. MADDEN. I supposed that everything we did here was serious.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I hardly think the gentleman is serious; but I will say that the Director General of the Pan American Union pays his own dues if it is proper for him to do so. The appropriations for the Pan American Union are made by the different Governments of Pan America and are based on population. We have 90,000,000 of population and pay $75,000 a year; the other countries have about 60,000,000 of population and pay $50,000 a year. These appropriations are spent upon the orders of the governing board, and the gentleman need not fear that any of it will be improperly spent.

Mr. MADDEN. I was rather impressed with the language of the letter that he wrote to the president of the association, with the idea that his membership or application for membership was a condescension to the association of commerce here, for the furtherance of the Pan American Union; and inasmuch as it was a part of the business of the director to advertise, not only himself as director general but the Pan American Union, it might be thought proper as a part of the expenditure for the Pan American Union.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman is mistaken if he thinks that the director general is advertising himself. The director general is a distinguished citizen. He has been a minister to Argentina, minister to Siam and a number of other countries, and for a great many years has been at the head of the Pan American Union, and he hardly needs advertising. The gentleman from Illinois has been facetious at the expense of the Director General of the Pan American Union, but I can assure him that my friend the director is so well known in this and other countries that he needs no advertisement, and need entertain no fear along the line suggested this morning.

Mr. MADDEN. Do I understand that there is no need of any fear being exercised on the part of the membership of this House that the gentleman who is Director General of the Pan American Union will not advertise himself or that he needs no advertising?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think if the gentleman from Illinois was as distinguished a man as the director general, that would be advertisement enough for him, as it is for the director general. His deeds and performances and his accomplishments have advertised him.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that if any person could buy the director general at the value he places on himself and sell him at the real value, there would be a great loss on the part of the purchaser.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. While the gentleman from Illinois may not entertain as high an opinion of the director general as he does of himself, there are a great many other people in this country who put a much higher estimate on this gentleman's attainments and abilities than he himself has ever dreamed of.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman from Virginia has any justification for saying that I place a high value on or have a high opinion of myself.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I did not say that; the gentleman misunderstood me. I said that the gentleman might not entertain as high an opinion of the director general as he does of himself, but there are a great many people who do entertain a much higher opinion of him than he does of himself.

Mr. MADDEN. I am glad to know that, and I am sorry to know that so many people of the United States are in the habit of accepting a man's estimate of himself when that estimate is far above what it ought to be.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That remark could not possibly apply to the Director General of the Pan American Union. I will also add that the work of that union has been very valuable. I believe that if any Member of Congress who may be in the slightest degree skeptical about the scope, usefulness, and extent of the work being done here for the benefit of commerce, friendship, and good understanding among the American nations would find time to spend 10 or 15 minutes in the Pan American Building and inspect its work he would be convinced beyond question that it is worthy not only of his vote for its maintenance but of his close personal interest. The correspondence with every variety of persons in all parts of the world amounts to hundreds of letters a day; the Pan American Union is constantly issuing publications, pamphlets, and reports for which there is a greater demand than it can supply; the building contains a most practical library, great collections of maps of all the American countries, the newspapers and magazines of these lands, and between 500 and 1,000 persons visit it every day.

Finally, there can be no better evidence of the practical usefulness of the Pan American Union than the fact that during the last year over 80 per cent of the total membership of the Senate and House of Representatives repeatedly applied to the Pan American Union for information or for bulletins, documents, and reports to send to their constituents.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up any time of the committee, but I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a copy of an editorial that recently appeared in the News, a newspaper published at Lynchburg, Va.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is the article about?

Mr. WINGO. It is about money and credits.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The paper referred to is owned by one of my colleagues.

Mr. WINGO. That was one reason I thought it ought to go into the RECORD. I think it is a very able article and very pertinent, and I think it ought to be preserved.

Mr. MANN. Who is the editor of the paper?

Mr. WINGO. I do not know who the editor is. The owner is the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Mr. GLASS.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL BUREAU OF THE PERMANENT COURT OF ARBITRATION.

To meet the share of the United States in the expenses for the calendar year 1913 of the International Bureau of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, created under article 22 of the convention concluded at The Hague, July 29, 1899, for the pacific settlement of international disputes, $1,250.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, entitled "My mother—a prayer." The article is by Tom Dillon, one of the most talented and popular writers on the Pacific coast. It is a beautiful tribute that will find a fervent response in the heart of every real man, and it is well worthy a place in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE.

For the payment of the quota of the United States for the support of the International Institute of Agriculture for the calendar year 1915, $8,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Here are three items for this International Institute of Agriculture that aggregate $16,600. The item under consideration carries an increase of $3,200 over that appropriated last year. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee or any other member of the committee what purpose is served by this International Institute of Agriculture? As I recall, it had its genesis some six or seven years ago in this House on the statement of the then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I believe some altruistic-minded gentleman from California took up his abode in Rome and began to form some kind of an international institute. Wishing to give it some degree of prominence, he entitled it the International Institute of Agriculture. The appropriation has been carried from year to year, and now we have an increase amounting to almost double the amount that we appropriated last year. Will the chairman kindly favor us with some information, because the hearings are rather vapid, as far as this item is concerned? What is the real purpose of the appropriation?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken in assuming that Mr. Lubin started this institute himself. It was first inaugurated by a chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is the result of a treaty of June 7, 1905. No provision has been made for the termination of that treaty, and this gentleman from California has always been the member of the institute ever since the institute was established.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that Mr. Lubin who is the member for whom we provide a salary of $3,600 in the following paragraph?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; Mr. David Lubin. This institute is considered of great importance by the Agricultural Department and the State Department in studying questions and distributing information relative to agriculture and agricultural methods the world over. It has been recommended by both departments, and the increase is due to the fact that when the institute was first established there was a minimum and a maximum amount that each nation should be called on to contribute. The minimum amount was first asked for, and under that we contributed $3,200 less than we do now. The institute has now gotten together and has called on all of the contributing nations for the maximum amount, and that makes the difference. Instead of $4,800 the amount now is $8,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the House as to the aggregate amount required to maintain this great institute?

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman mean from this country alone?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; from all of the contributing countries.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think about 20 nations are contributing members, and they contribute in proportion to their population. We are one of the largest contributors. I suppose it must take one hundred or more thousand dollars—$200,000 or $300,000 from all of the nations. A great deal of it has been expended in distributing agricultural information collected at this institute.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I notice in the third item that we provide $5,000 for translating and printing into English some of these publications. Does Great Britain contribute anything for a like service?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is only for the distribution of the literature that is to come to this country. England pays for what goes to her country. The translations that we pay for are to be distributed here.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose the articles that are distributed in England and in this country are virtually the same?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Oh, no. We pay for our own translations, and we use them, and it is up to England as to whether she will have a distribution made.

Mr. STAFFORD. Through whom are these publications distributed?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They are distributed through the Agricultural Department of this country, the different States, the national granges, and agricultural organizations of different character.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I think what the committee would like more than anything else in respect to this matter would be to have the gentleman from Virginia explain, if he can, the good that we get out of this international agricultural conference or commission or whatever it is. My attention has been directed to it for a long time, and I have never been able to find any good coming to the farmers of this country in the maintenance of this institute. If the gentleman has any information that he can give the committee that would show that we are getting anything for the money that we are spending, I would like to have him do it. I understand, of course, that we are subscribers, and that we have either to withdraw or appropriate this money, but it is my opinion that it will be in the interest of economy to withdraw entirely from participation in this institute, and if he knows any reason why we should continue this participation I wish he would tell us.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, there is a difference of opinion among intelligent gentlemen as to whether we get any benefit from this institute. For years the question has been raised on the floor of this House, some contending that we get no benefit and others that we get a great benefit. The Department of Agriculture thinks it is a very beneficial appropriation. There are people in the country who question whether the Department of Agriculture is of very much benefit to the agricultural interests of the country. I take issue with them. I think the Department of Agriculture has done a great work, and I agree with the department in reference to this institute and that it is a beneficial thing to scatter throughout the country agricultural information gathered from all the nations of the earth. So, if there is any progressive movement in any nation with reference to agriculture, we may get the benefit of the ideas of that movement, through the publications that are sent to our Agricultural Department and the agricultural departments of the States, and to the National Grangers, farmers' unions, and such organizations. The only advantage we can get is educational, and the Agriculture Department here and the State departments and others connected with matters pertaining to agriculturists believe it is of benefit in this way.

Mr. HAMLIN. I asked for information. I, as other Members, of course, receive every so often certain bulletins issued by this institute. I have given some attention to these bulletins and I confess I can not see where the farmers of the country, the agriculturists of the country, get any benefit from them. They do give some little information as to estimates of different crops in different countries throughout the world, but so far as giving the farmers of the country any real benefit I confess I can not see where they get it. Unlike our department here, and I agree with the gentleman from Virginia that there is no department of the Government that is of greater benefit to all the people than the Agricultural Department, at least that is my idea of it; our Agricultural Department gives out information that goes out through the country that teaches our farmers things that they ought to know in the way of cultivating the soil, marketing crops, and so forth. You do not get any of that information through the bulletins issued by this international institute, but all I have seen have simply been an estimate each year, or every so often each year, as to the probable yield of different cereals in the different countries of the world.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Well, the gentleman has not studied these bulletins closely, then, because the purpose of these bulletins is to give information of agricultural conditions, including agricultural progress and agricultural methods, and some of them give statistics——

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; I have noticed that, and I confess something may have escaped my notice, but all the statistics I have seen——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. As to how useful this institute is is a matter of opinion. You can have an opinion on that, and the committee thought it would be wiser to take the opinion of the Agricultural Department and the State departments and all other agricultural interests in the country and continue this small appropriation, hoping it would result in benefit to the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. HAMLIN. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will understand I am not in any manner criticizing that committee, either the chairman or his committee. I understand that they have to continue this appropriation unless Congress withdraws our participation, but I believe the Congress ought to withdraw and cease appropriating for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL RAILWAY CONGRESS.

To pay the quota of the United States as an adhering member of the International Railway Congress for the year 1915, $400.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what the purpose of this international congress is?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is the railway congress?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It is to collect public data regarding railway safety appliances and matters of that kind. There are 35 nations besides the United States which are members of it. The first appropriation we made was in 1905; we entered into an agreement to appropriate until 1914, and under our agreement this is the last appropriation we will be called upon to make.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think this is worth while?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. This is another one of those matters that is not of very vast importance and its usefulness is merely a matter of opinion. Our State Department entered into this agreement and it is closed with this appropriation.

Mr. COX. Where does this congress meet?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It meets in Brussels.

Mr. COX. Does it meet every year or has it met every year since it was organized?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think so.

Mr. COX. I understood the gentleman to say this is the last year for which the United States makes an appropriation?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. COX. I think it is a good thing.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say the last year we are required to make an appropriation was for 1914.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This is for 1915.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I meant 1914–15. The congress meets after the 1st of July of this year.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES AND EXPENSES, UNITED STATES COURT FOR CHINA.

Judge of the United States court for China, $8,000; district attorney of the United States court for China, $4,000; marshal of the United States court for China, $3,000; clerk of the United States court for China, $3,000; stenographer of the United States court for China, $1,800; for court expenses, including reference law books, $9,000; total, $28,800.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 8, after the figures "28,800," by inserting the following:

Hereafter the judge receiving a salary hereunder shall be paid monthly by the disbursing officer of the Department of State, and to him all certificates of nonabsence or of the cause of absence of such judge shall be sent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 16, by adding after the figures "28,800," in line 8, the following: "Hereafter the judge receiving a salary hereunder shall be paid monthly by the disbursing officer of the Department of State, and to him all certificates of nonabsence or of the cause of absence of such judge shall be sent."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say I do not know whether it is subject to a point of order or not. If it is——

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt about it being subject to a point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am in doubt whether the point of order should be sustained or not.

Mr. MANN. Well, if the gentleman wants to argue the point of order, we will dispose of that very quickly. Give us the reasons for the change.

Mr. CRAMTON. If I can discuss the whole proposition together——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair prefers to hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve the point; there is no question about the point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I think there may be a question unless I change the form of it a little. As a matter of fact, this entire court over there does not belong, as I understand it, under the State Department, and appropriation for it should not be carried in this bill. When the court was created there was nothing said about putting it under the jurisdiction of the Department of State, but that department has gradually taken charge of it, and now an appropriation is carried in this bill. There is a statute carrying the same provision as I have suggested there, in section 13 of the Dockery Act, which makes that provision which I have suggested apply to all judges of Federal courts except consular courts; and if I had offered the amendment, simply repeating the language of the Dockery Act, which already does apply to this court, I can not understand how it would be subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indulge the Chair for a question? Does the gentleman contend this is not a consular court?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes, sir; I contend it is not. It is a court constituted just the same as any other Federal court and made to succeed the consular courts, which we found to be undesirable. But I am not particular about discussing the point of order, except that I want to make that explanation. I did not follow the language of the statute which, I believe, controls the court already, but which has been treated as a nullity and disregarded. I changed it to this extent, namely, to make those reports go to the Department of State, which has now assumed jurisdiction over that court, instead of having them go to the Department of Justice, as other courts are required to report. I do that because inasmuch as that department is taking jurisdiction the reports necessarily should go there, and inasmuch as I have made that change, of course the point of order, I suppose, would be good if the gentleman desires to press it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. CRAMTON. If he will withhold the point of order——

Mr. MANN. I reserved the point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. Now, I want to put into the RECORD provisions of section 13 of the Dockery Act, as follows:

Before transmission to the Department of the Treasury the accounts of district attorneys, assistant attorneys, marshals, commissioners, clerks, and other officers of the courts of the United States, except consular courts, made out and approved as required by law, and accounts relating to prisoners convicted or held for trial in any court of the United States, and all other accounts relating to the business of the Department of Justice or of the courts of the United States other than consular courts, shall be sent with their vouchers to the Attorney General and examined under his supervision.

Judges receiving salaries from the Treasury of the United States shall be paid monthly by the disbursing officer of the Department of Justice, and to him all certificates of nonabsence or of the cause of absence of judges in the Territories shall be sent.

Now, that is a good provision as applied to all the other courts of the United States. But here is a court located by itself, thousands of miles away, and it is also desirable it should apply to that court. They have not applied it, although it seems to me they should, and the need of it is shown by the fact that in the case of a recent judge of this particular court there is evidence to show that he was absent without the knowledge or direction of any of his superiors, so to speak, for a period altogether of 16 months in the time of 3 years. He is drawing a salary of $8,000 a year, which in that country is practically equal to $20,000 or $25,000 a year, and still he is absent from his post for a period of 16 months out of 3 years. And I submit that there ought to be a provision by which that man will be obliged, when he is absent and leaves his jurisdiction, going over to Japan to some summer resort or health resort for such a long period, that at least somebody ought to know that he has been away and why he was away. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is an extraterritorial court, with jurisdiction over certain causes affecting American citizens in China. The court is located in China—outside of the United States.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will he kindly, while he is on his feet, state the reasons or justifications for the establishment in China of this particular court, different from that in other countries, for the information of the committee?

Mr. MANN. We do not have courts in any other countries. But when this court was established it was established in conformity with the treaty with China under which the United States was permitted to establish a court which would have jurisdiction over causes in which American citizens were parties. That was a concession given by China to the United States, I suppose, not wholly involuntarily, and I think the same concession exists in various other countries.

Now, that is a matter that relates to our foreign affairs. It belongs to the Department of State. When this law was passed, following a treaty arrangement, it did not specifically provide that this court should be under the jurisdiction of the Department of State. But I think everybody understood that it would be, and the Department of Justice declined to take any jurisdiction over the court, holding that it was not a United States court in the ordinary sense of the word or coming within the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, and that department declined to entertain any jurisdiction concerning the court or the payment of fees or salaries or other disbursements. In my judgment, that is where they belong. Now, my friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] desires to practically transfer that jurisdiction from the Department of State to the Department of Justice.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not expressed that desire in the pending amendment, even if I do have that desire.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says he has not expressed the desire in the pending amendment, but I think he has.

Mr. CRAMTON. But my amendment provides for their reporting to the Department of State.

Mr. MANN. Your amendment provides for a report to the Auditor for the Department of State, I think, does it not?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is in the Treasury Department. But that means that the accounts will go through the Department of Justice. That is where the accounts of the Department of Justice go—to the Auditor for the State and Other Departments.

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Where do they go?

Mr. GARDNER. They go direct to the Auditor for the State and Other Departments—not to the Department of Justice.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is such a man here—the man I have provided these reports should go to.

Mr. MANN. There is a man who audits the Department of Justice accounts, but he is Auditor for the Department of State.

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. That is what I said. Both gentlemen were wrong about it. The Auditor for the State and Other Departments is the man who audits these accounts, and the purpose of this amendment is practically to declare that this foreign court is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. I have no doubt that he now receives his pay monthly, although I do not know about that.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. Under the Dockery Act, it is required that other judges make this return to the Auditor for the Department of Justice. In my amendment I have provided simply that they shall make a report as to their absence to the Auditor for the Department of State. Now, how does that transfer jurisdiction from the State Department to the Department of Justice?

Mr. MANN. The Auditor for the Department of Justice is the Auditor for the State and Other Departments. And that is the purpose of the amendment, to transfer the jurisdiction which, under the treaty and under the law, now rests in the Department of State, to the Department of Justice, which does not even desire the jurisdiction.

Even if the gentleman had offered his amendment in the exact language of the existing law, making it come under this paragraph so that it would apply to this paragraph, it would still be subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The judge of the said court and the district attorney shall, when the sessions of the court are held at other cities than Shanghai, receive in addition to their salaries, their actual expenses during such sessions, not to exceed $10 per day for the judge and $5 per day for the district attorney, and so much as may be necessary for said purposes during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. CRAMTON. On the word "actual," in line 12.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has been reserved.

Mr. GARDNER. Well, I agree with the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that it is new legislation on an appropriation bill, but the gentleman from Illinois is entirely mistaken in saying that the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] can not in any way transfer the jurisdiction over the Chinese court away from the State Department to the Department of Justice. If it would transfer it anywhere, it would be to transfer it to the Treasury Department. But it would not be transferring it anywhere where it is not now.

The fact is that the auditing work in the Treasury Department is divided up among a number of different auditors. For instance, there is an Auditor for the War Department and there is an Auditor, I rather think, for the Navy Department, but I am not sure; and then there is a general auditor, under which various departments are lumped, known as the "Auditor for the State and Other Departments," and under that particular auditor comes the Department of Justice.

Now, so far as concerns the transferring by that amendment to the Department of Justice, if anything, it would indicate more strongly that it was to continue under the Department of Justice.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I will ask my colleague if he has read the hearings in the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice relating to this matter during the last summer, I think it was?

Mr. GARDNER. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman has missed a good deal of information on this subject.

Mr. GARDNER. I will tell the gentleman what I was trying to do during the past summer. It was to be elected governor of Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is pending.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the gentleman only reserved a point of order, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] only moved to strike out the last word. I ask recognition in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I will state, if the chairman of the committee is agreeable to an amendment to make that section correspond with the statute on which it is based, I will not insist on the point of order. In the statute the language used is "necessary expenses." For some reason or through some oversight that word "necessary" is changed to "actual." Now, being somewhat familiar with the hearings referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I have been strongly impressed with the necessity at least of using a word as strong as "necessary." As a matter of fact that does not seem to hold down the Department of State. They have, as the hearings clearly show, audited and paid accounts of a recent judge who, on one of his expeditions from Shanghai to Canton, I believe, to hold court went and spent perhaps 10 days in the city of Hongkong.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indulge the Chair for a question?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In what respect does the proposed language in this paragraph differ from the language in the existing appropriation act passed at the last session?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not compared it with that. I have compared it, however, with the statute creating this court, which, I assume, is the statute on which we must depend. The statute creating the court uses the word "necessary."

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. When was this 10 days' stay in Yokohama?

Mr. CRAMTON. Ten days occupied in travel and staying there. It was Hongkong.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. When was that?

Mr. CRAMTON. It was during the incumbency of the recent judge of that court. Apparently the time has gone by to take any action as to that trip. The accounts have already been audited, but it impressed me with the fact that instead of paying all the expenses that the judge might actually make we should at least confine him to his necessary expenses.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the amendment suggested by the gentleman is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order, and move to amend that section by striking out the word "actual" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 16, line 12, by striking out the word "actual" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "necessary."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment. I think there should be some care exercised as to expenses of these courts, and I suppose that is a help and safeguard, and I am in favor of the amendment.

But this matter of the probate court in China has attracted a great deal of attention in certain quarters. I am a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department. Before that committee there appeared a Mr. Cunningham, who is now at the Dewey Hotel here, and he made charges against the probate procedure and the way the State Department handled a probate case in which he was concerned, involving something like $100,000 of property belonging to his deceased brother, and the charges that he made were of so severe and incriminating a nature that they would make a highway robber blush.

Mr. MADDEN. Was there anything heard on the other side of the case?

Mr. BRYAN. I will tell you. This gentleman tried in every way in the world to get some sort of an investigation of that matter, and he is now going from one place to another trying to get some investigation made of the matter, and to enable the State Department and those who are responsible to clear themselves or to establish the truth of his charges; and yet he is absolutely unable to accomplish any results whatever.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman does not charge any official connected with the State Department now?

Mr. BRYAN. It was before the present administration came in, before the beginning of the present administration, that these matters occurred. It was a judicial matter, a matter of probate over there in China by the Consular Service, and I do not suppose the Secretary of State had anything in particular to do with it. But there was a loose administration in this court, and I believe there is merit to the charges that this old gentleman makes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I saw the charges that the gentleman refers to. Would the gentleman undertake to have them investigated?

Mr. BRYAN. I favored the taking up of the matter by the Committee on the Expenditures in the State Department, but the other members of the committee stated that they were without jurisdiction. The chairman of the committee concluded, all things taken together, that we were without jurisdiction. We submitted the proposition to some solicitor down here, and upon having the opinion of that counsel in the State Department it was thought we had no jurisdiction of the matter.

But every member of the committee believed that the charges were of such a nature, and that there was so much probable cause attached to the whole case, that somebody ought to investigate it and some kind of relief ought to be administered.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does not the gentleman understand that there is a very grave question as to whether the consular authorities there have the right to exercise the probate jurisdiction which they are exercising?

Mr. BRYAN. That was one of the questions involved.

Mr. CRAMTON. And has not the gentleman to whom you refer been able to get any positive decision from either the Department of Justice or the Department of State as to whether those consular authorities were exercising a proper jurisdiction?

Mr. BRYAN. I believe there was some decision to the effect that the court did have jurisdiction over there. I think the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department [Mr. HAMLIN] was diligent in the matter, and I am not making any accusations against the committee or attempting to throw any insinuations of that kind; but I do say I think that old gentleman ought to have relief, and I believe the present Secretary of State ought to take enough interest in that case to have it ferreted out and the right and truth and justice established.

In this estate there was issued a 10-day notice by publication in China to inform an absent brother in the State of Maine that they would proceed to probate the will and distribute the property. I do not say all the other charges are true, but I do say they are of so grave a nature that they should be investigated. Every tribunal has plead jurisdiction on the old man and he has not been able to have a hearing.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, being chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, I know something about this case; and since the question has been raised I think it may be well for me to make a statement.

A brother of the old gentleman to whom the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] refers died in Shanghai, China, leaving quite an estate. He left a will. Our consul over there took probate jurisdiction and administered the estate and made distribution in accordance with the provisions of the will. That will conveyed all of his property to his sister, who lived in the State of Maine. The old gentleman to whom the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] refers brought suit in the State of Maine, had a hearing, had his day in court, appealed to the appellate court of the State of Maine, and the case was decided adversely to him, both in the lower court and also in the appellate court. After he had gone through the courts of Maine, a jurisdiction which he himself selected, and an adverse decision had been rendered, he then came before our committee and raised the question of the jurisdiction of the consular agent at China to take probate jurisdiction and administer this estate over there.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not a fact that the decision of the court in Maine was that that court did not have jurisdiction and that the gentleman never did get a hearing on the merits of the question in Maine?

Mr. HAMLIN. My recollection of the matter is that the decision of the court in Maine was to the effect that the deceased had lost his residence in Maine, and therefore the Maine court had no jurisdiction of the matter. I may be in error about this, for it has been some time since I read the opinion of that court.

As chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department and by direction of that committee I called upon the Solicitor of the State Department for an opinion as to whether our consular agent in China had probate jurisdiction. There is an old decision by a former Attorney General that seemed to hold that our consular agents had no probate jurisdiction; but in a subsequent treaty made with China there is a provision under which the Solicitor for the State Department, backed up by a decision of the Department of Justice, holds that now the consular agent does have probate jurisdiction. It has been a question in my mind. I read that decision, and I think it is somewhat of a debatable question; but our law officers have decided it, and I have their opinion, and if Members think it is of importance enough to incorporate in the RECORD I shall be glad to incorporate it. Our law officers advised our committee that the consul general has probate jurisdiction. Therefore that being true it was my opinion that our committee had nothing whatever to investigate.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would be glad if the gentleman would incorporate that opinion in the RECORD.

Mr. BRYAN. In other words, the committee concluded that if the judge over there had jurisdiction—that is, that if the consular agent had jurisdiction in China—it was out of the sphere of our committee to investigate whether that man's will was administered fraudulently or not.

Mr. HAMLIN. That was the point.

Mr. BRYAN. We did not go into the question of fraud, although the consular agent still stands accused of fraud.

Mr. HAMLIN. This old gentleman charges that there were two wills, and that there was some irregularity in the execution of this second will. I do not understand that he has accused the consular agent of not distributing the estate in accordance with the provisions of the second will.

Mr. BRYAN. But he does charge that the will probated was a fraudulent will, I think.

Mr. MADDEN. He does not charge that the consular agent hypothecated any of the money or anything of that sort?

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, no. I think he charged that there were some exorbitant fees charged, but that was a mere bagatelle. It did not amount to anything, practically.

Mr. MADDEN. There was no charge of highway robbery or anything of that sort?

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, no; no charge of corruption or anything of that sort. He simply charges that that second will was not properly attested and ought not to have been admitted to probate, and that the consular agent had no probate jurisdiction. On that question we concluded that there was nothing for our committee to investigate, in the face of the decision of the Solicitor for the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] to strike out the word "actual" and insert the word "necessary."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of premises for the use of the United States court for China at Shanghai, $2,400.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 18, by striking out "$2,400" and inserting "$1,600."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 16, line 18, by striking out "$2,400" and inserting "$1,600."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I will admit in the beginning that my hopes of securing the adoption of this amendment are not high; but my purpose is largely to bring this before the House, and if possible to bring it sufficiently to the attention of the Department of State so that that great department will come to realize that it is desirable to have an honest administration of things in that far-off court. If it is desirable to have a court there at all, I believe it is more important to have an honest administration in that court than any other Federal court that we have, for the reason that appeals from that far-off court must be taken clear over to San Francisco, and the expenses are such that the ordinary individual can have no appeal. He is absolutely at the mercy of that court. In the hearings that the gentleman from Illinois has referred to, and which I heard as a member of that committee, I was impressed by the fact that that court absolutely needs an overhauling, a thorough investigation; and I hope that the Department of State, which has jurisdiction over it, will do what is necessary.

Now, as to the paragraph in question and the amendment I have suggested, there is no question, as I understand it, but that we are paying, on the audit of the State Department, $2,400 a year for the use of a building there, supposedly for the exclusive use of that court. As a matter of fact, official evidence was introduced before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, which I have here in my hand, showing that as a matter of fact the parties who rent the building receive only $1,440 a year for it. What becomes of the difference, whether it is a rake-off for somebody or whether somebody gets house rent out of it, I do not know.

I hope the Department of State will before they ask for another appropriation of $2,400 for the use of the court find out whether they need that amount of money for the court and whether some part of it goes to some unworthy use. I hope, in view of the evidence that has been submitted here showing the municipal tax receipts of Shanghai—the taxes being based on the amount of rental, and they show that the amount of rental is only $1,440 a year—that they will look into this matter. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment may prevail.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this court has been overhauled. There is another judge now in office.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. It was overhauled to this extent, that about the time these hearings were being held the resignation of the former judge was received, and while the hearings were in progress the resignation was accepted and a new man sent over there. Is it not true that there has been a succession of scandals, one after another, in that court?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. What I was going to say is that there had been a scandal in the transaction of business of that court, and the court has been overhauled, and there is another judge under another administration, and there will be no more scandal in the future. Now, this rent has been contracted for.

Mr. CRAMTON. What overhauling has there been, except the resignation of one man and the appointing of a new one?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The resignation of the man who created the scandal.

Mr. CRAMTON. Was any attention given to the marshal and the other officers of the court?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They are investigating the other officers, who hold office at the pleasure of the President, and there need not be any fear that there is going to be any more scandal.

Mr. CRAMTON. They are now investigating, the gentleman says?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes. Now, as I say, this rent is needed because it has been contracted for. If the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan is borne out by evidence, the rent in the future will be reduced.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it would be fair to allow these statements to go in the RECORD without an explanation of the situation. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] indulges in certain charges without having, I think, any official evidence on the subject. There were charges made against this court or against the judge by an attorney coming from over there who, I believe, was disbarred, and who certainly did not have a decent reputation. The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice proceeded to have hearings on the subject far enough to permit this discredited attorney and claim agent who had been kicked out of court for corrupt work, as alleged, to make statements before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. When it came about time for the other side to be heard the committee found that it did not have jurisdiction, because this court was not under the Department of Justice, and refused to proceed any further with the hearings. There were requests made on behalf of the judge that he might be heard by some committee.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman from Illinois is entirely correct——

Mr. MANN. I knew that, or I would not have made the statement.

Mr. HAMLIN (continuing). The committee finding itself without jurisdiction, referred the case to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department. Now, the statement that the gentleman from Illinois is about to make and to which I want to call attention, so that he may not be inaccurate, is that when the matter came before our committee I, as chairman of that committee, conferred with the gentleman who claimed to be a friend of and representative of this judge and told him that if his friend desired a hearing our committee would certainly afford him an opportunity. In the meantime the judge resigned, and they stated that they did not care to pursue the matter any further. So I think that no fault can be charged to our committee.

Mr. MANN. I was not charging fault to anyone, although the gentleman is inaccurate if he means to convey the impression that the judge resigned before he asked for a hearing, because the request was made for a hearing before the gentleman's committee, as is disclosed by the record.

Mr. HAMLIN. Not before my committee.

Mr. MANN. Yes; before the gentleman's committee; and the gentleman's committee decided that they did not have any jurisdiction and would not proceed.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman is speaking about the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice?

Mr. MANN. Yes; the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is not my committee.

Mr. CRAMTON. Let me say to the gentleman that the case was taken up before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice and proceeded with on the assumption that this court was under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice.

Mr. MANN. I understand that; I have just stated that.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to correct the further statement by the gentleman from Illinois that when we had received all the evidence on one side we concluded the case and refused any hearing for the other side. Whereas the fact is that having heard to some extent the attorney to whom the gentleman refers, I think somewhat erroneously, we called in the Auditor for the Department of State.

Mr. MANN. I am familiar with what the committee did.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then the gentleman is unfair to the committee.

Mr. MANN. I am not unfair to the committee at all. The Auditor for the Department of State was called in not in behalf of the gentleman against whom the charges were made, but in behalf of the gentleman who made the charges, and the auditor did not sustain the gentleman at all. When these charges had been made to the committee, the judge or some of his friends desired a hearing before the committee, and the committee said that they had no jurisdiction. I have no criticism to make of the committee; they had just found it out; but they had jurisdiction long enough not only to hear the scandalous charges, which I think there was little foundation for, but it seems to have been enough to convince the gentleman from Michigan, although they had heard only one side, that that side was correct.

I do not know what the facts are, but I do know that it is a scandal itself to charge that a judge was in delinquency simply because the committee had heard a discredited, disbarred attorney's charges against the judge without hearing the other side. The judge delayed his resignation for a long time, because he was seeking to have these charges investigated and have a hearing before some committee, but was unable to do so. This was long after he had decided to resign on account of his health, and so announced before the charges were presented.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, there never was an application for a hearing before our committee by the judge. Some gentleman representing himself to be a friend came in and was allowed to take part in the hearing and did ask for an opportunity to put in certain statements.

We had proceeded partly with the gentleman making the charges, and then at his suggestion called in the Auditor for the Department of State, and as soon as it appeared from the testimony of that auditor that the expenditures were those of the Department of State the committee, of course, was absolutely without jurisdiction. We immediately closed the hearings, although the attorney to whom reference has been made had not completed his case. In justice to the attorney making the charges I want to say that there has been some unfairness in connection with the gentleman's attack upon him, because I do not understand that that gentleman is now a disbarred attorney, and a great deal of that which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] believes is to his discredit is due to the fact that in his controversies with this particular discredited judge there has been an abuse of power on the part of the judge. I am not one that is charging that everything said against that judge is true. I simply know that there were things presented in that committee which convinced me that there should be a thorough overhauling, not only of the judge but of the entire official circle over there; and we went as far as we could in our committee, and there the matter dropped. The judge, under fire, did resign, and there has been no hearing. We are not to blame for that. If anyone is to blame, it seems to me the judge himself, who resigned under fire, is to blame.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. In this discussion of the judge we have lost sight of the man who lost the money, or claims he lost the money. You have lost sight of the possessor of something like $100,000 that was involved in the matter, and I desire to call attention to the peculiar situation that has developed here. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, of which committee I am a member, states that he offered to that judge, to that side of the case, a hearing if he wanted it, but the facts of the record show that such right was denied to the man making the claims, Mr. Cunningham, upon the ground that the committee had no jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is speaking about something else. I desire to ask him whether he thinks the Cunningham matter has anything to do with this court?

Mr. BRYAN. Not at present.

Mr. MANN. Or did it ever have?

Mr. BRYAN. That is what we were talking about.

Mr. MANN. That is not the consul general. The probate matter had nothing to do with this matter pending in the House.

Mr. BRYAN. Did I not say that we had traveled away from the man who had lost the money and that I wanted to call attention to him?

Mr. MANN. I supposed the gentleman was talking about something in the bill, and that is the reason I asked whether the gentleman thought it had any relation to the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. What we considered and discussed in this committee had something to do with the $100,000 that Mr. Cunningham claims he was defrauded out of.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Washington became a member of the committee—and I neglected to state this a while ago—something occurred to which I wish to direct his attention. The gentleman says that we did not give Mr. Cunningham a hearing. He is entirely in error about that. The committee, during the last session of Congress, devoted one whole day to his matter. I do not mean by that just the forenoon of the day, but the afternoon also. We listened to a legal argument—a very clear, cogent, splendid argument—by a former distinguished Member of this House, Mr. Littlefield, and by attorneys representing Mr. Cunningham upon the other side, when the whole matter was thrashed out by counsel on both sides. It is not accurate to say that we denied him a hearing; but after we had obtained the information from the Solicitor of the State Department as to the jurisdiction of the consul over in China, we set a day and heard his attorneys and also Mr. Littlefield, of Maine, who represented the sister to whom this bequest was made.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the gentleman will take all my time. The gentleman says that we did not deny him a hearing, but what kind of a hearing did we give him? We heard him on the question of whether or not we had a right to give him a hearing, and a gentleman who was formerly a Member of this House, Mr. Littlefield, made a very strong argument that the committee did not have a right to give him a hearing, and the committee sustained that argument. We entered judgment of dismissal on that ground and refused a hearing, as I have already said. Mr. Cunningham, with all of these charges, went to the court in Maine, and he was denied the right to go into the matter there for want of jurisdiction. The court ruled it did not have the right or jurisdiction to give him a hearing. He then went before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. That committee said it had no jurisdiction. He came to us—no jurisdiction, although the distinguished chairman [Mr. HAMLIN] says he told the judge that he could have a hearing if he wanted it. He has gone from committee to committee and to the State Department, and there is no jurisdiction there. I maintain that inasmuch as it is stated here by the distinguished chairman of this committee [Mr. FLOOD of Virginia] that there were scandals over there, then this particular charge ought to be investigated and the facts of the matter determined, inasmuch as this old gentleman has gone from court to court and from department to department with his complaints. Why is it that the other side objects to hearing, thus arguing all day by so distinguished and expensive a lawyer as Mr. Littlefield to keep the curtain drawn? "No jurisdiction" is their long suit for a plea.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. I would like to know if this is the Cunningham case which the gentleman is referring to?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. If this House could know the facts in that case, I think it would be ashamed not to take some action in the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARBITRATION OF OUTSTANDING PECUNIARY CLAIMS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

For the expenses of the arbitration of outstanding pecuniary claims between the United States and Great Britain, in accordance with the special agreement concluded for that purpose August 18, 1910, and the schedules of claims thereunder, including office rent in the District of Columbia and the compensation of arbitrator, umpire, agent, counsel, clerical and other assistants, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, and to be immediately available, $50,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the words "and to be immediately available."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 18, lines 3 and 4, by striking out the words "and to be immediately available."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question in reference to this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Georgia to reserve the point of order on the paragraph?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not reserve a point of order after an amendment has been had.

Mr. BARTLETT. The amendment cured the point of order. I have not made the point of order. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. As I recall, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill carried the money that was necessary for this award of the arbitration board to dispose of the business at its recent hearings.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. And this now is for a continuation for the next fiscal year?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The next fiscal year. We expect to have another board of arbitrators. In the meantime they will have to keep up the branch that represents the American interests—the attorneys and agents, or whatever they are called.

Mr. BARTLETT. They do not call it anything.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. This tribunal consists of a court of arbitration composed of a representative of this country and a representative of England, and then they have to keep up a branch of it in the shape of attorneys, who prepare claims of American citizens and defend the claims made by British citizens.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman tell me how long this board has been established?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It was established August 18, 1910.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand many of the claims are of long standing; many of them have been standing for years?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; a great many of the claims.

Mr. BARTLETT. Can the gentleman give us any idea whether this arbitration board will be able to dispose of the cases before it in the next fiscal year?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. As I understand it, they will dispose of all the claims that have been presented—that is, the schedule that has been made up.

Mr. BARTLETT. They have disposed of them?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Of the schedule that was made up heretofore, and they think that next year they can dispose of the schedule being made up, consisting of claims presented up to this time.

Mr. BARTLETT. The hearings have been adjourned at the present time?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. BARTLETT. And they occupied probably three months of this year in the hearings of these cases, I understand.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think so.

Mr. BARTLETT. And now they have adjourned to such time as they shall be called together.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The American part of this tribunal wishes to have a session in the fall. The English branch of it does not care to have one called for some reason. I believe they have not prepared their claims or for some other reason want a postponement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was very much interested in this, but on account of the confusion created by those gentlemen who do not care to expedite business I did not catch all of it. I understand there will not be another session of this court or tribunal this year.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The English branch has suggested that they should have no session of this tribunal this year, but our representative, Mr. Chandler Anderson, insisted on there being one to dispose of some claims that our branch have gotten ready and which they wish to dispose of as soon as possible.

Mr. WINGO. My information is that they were in session a very short time this year, and they have quit their labors, and the English representatives perhaps will not agree to a meeting this year. Then what is the necessity for making this appropriation?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The necessity is this: This tribunal consists of two branches——

Mr. WINGO. I understand that.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. One branch of it is a court and the other branch has an agent and a number of attorneys to prepare the American claims and to defend the claims asserted by British subjects. They have to prepare those claims before this court meets and present them when the court does meet. Now, the English part of the court does not want to have another meeting this year, and our branch insists upon it, as they have claims ready to submit to the court. Whether the court meets or not, they have to keep the attorneys at work on these claims, some of them of many years' standing.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman's idea is we have to maintain headquarters and a force, whether or not there is any meeting or business done?

Mr. CLINE. Let me remark that the attorneys we employ to defend this country against English claims are busy all the time briefing cases, preparing them for trial as well as preparing to present the claims of our citizens, so it keeps the counselor and his agents engaged all the time preparing those claims for the session of the arbitration court.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. When the court convenes—that part of the tribunal which may be called the court—we are ready to defend our claims and defend claims asserted against us; and that court was in session about three months, and now we want to have it in session about three months more in the fall.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

International conference for the purpose of drawing up international rules and regulations for the assignment of load lines to merchant ships: The appropriation of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the participation of the United States by official technical delegates in the international conference to be called by the British Government to meet in London during the year 1914 for the purpose of drawing up international rules and regulations for the assignment of load lines to merchant ships, made in the act approved February 28, 1913, making appropriation for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, is hereby reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon that. I think the gentleman will want to move to strike out the language on page 20, "made available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915"; every item in the bill is that.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. MANN. Well, I withdraw the point of order and move to strike out all of the paragraph after the word "reappropriated," in line 2, page 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 20, by striking out all of the paragraph after the word "reappropriated," in line 2.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second Pan American Scientific Congress: To enable the Government of the United States suitably to participate in the Second Pan American Scientific Congress, to be held at the city of Washington in October, 1915, and for the necessary expenses for clerks, printing (including the publication of the proceedings of the congress in English and Spanish), stationery and supplies, and other incidental expenses, including rent in the District of Columbia, and for the entertainment of the delegates, $35,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State; and authority is hereby given to the Secretary of State to invite the Governments of the American Republics to be represented by delegates at the said congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise to obtain information from the chairman of the committee as to wherein the provision found on page 20, lines 16 to 24, providing for the Fifth International Conference of American States, differs from the provision which we are now considering providing for the Second Pan American Scientific Congress.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Wherein it differs?

Mr. STAFFORD. This relates entirely, I assume, to the scientific congress?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. This other relates to the Pan American Congress, of which Mr. Barrett is Director General.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; it relates to the Congress of the American States, the first one of which the gentleman will recall assembled in this country in 1889, and as a result of that congress the union of the American States was formed, which ultimately resulted in the Pan American Union, of which Mr. Barrett is Director General. This Congress of American States—and we have had four of them already—the first meeting was here, the second one in Mexico in 1901, the third one at Rio de Janeiro in 1906, and the fourth one at Buenos Aires in 1910, and this one meets in Santiago, Chile.

All of the American States are represented. They discuss political and international questions, and all other questions of interest to this hemisphere.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a congress that is held under the jurisdiction of the Pan American Union, is it not?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I can not say it is under the jurisdiction of the Pan American Union. The Pan American Union is more or less under its jurisdiction, and was its creature.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Pan American Union takes charge, and the congress is virtually under its direction?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The Pan American Union makes some of the arrangements in reference to the congress, and of course plays an important part in it.

Mr. MOORE. I would like to know if this is the congress the last session of which was held at Santiago, Chile.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Of which one do you speak?

Mr. MOORE. The Second Pan American Scientific Congress.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; that was held there.

Mr. MOORE. The last session was held in Chile?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. And the next is to be held in the city of Washington?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Was this the full amount asked for by the Department of State?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No. The Secretary asked for $50,000, but we thought, as this congress did not convene until October of next year, we could appropriate the $35,000 now, which would permit the extension of the invitation, and that we could in the next bill appropriate the additional $15,000.

Mr. MOORE. I wanted to say that the American delegates to the convention at Santiago were very highly pleased with the entertainment they received and with the success of their congress.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I understand, I will say to the gentleman, that the Chilean Government appropriated $140,000 for the entertainment of the congress, and we propose in this bill and in the next bill to appropriate $50,000.

Mr. MOORE. It was hoped by those who had gone there as representatives of the United States to improve the relations on a scientific basis with those people of South America, that they might be able to receive and entertain these South American visitors equally as well as they themselves were received in South America, and it is a question whether $35,000 would enable them to do that.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The State Department thought that $50,000 was sufficient for this purpose. The committee agreed with the department, but we knew there was ample time to make the additional appropriation, and it was necessary now to make an appropriation in order to authorize the department and the President to extend the invitation and get ready.

Mr. MOORE. And this may be regarded as binding the United States to receive those South American delegates when the time comes?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Acquisition of embassy premises, Mexico City: For the purchase of a site and the construction of a building thereon at the City of Mexico, and for the furnishing of the building, or, as to the Secretary of State may seem best, for the purchase at said city of a site and a building already erected, and for the alteration, repair, and furnishing of such building and the construction of an addition thereto, if necessary, for the use of the embassy to Mexico, both as the residence of the diplomatic officials and for the offices of the embassy, $150,000.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the chairman of the committee that I desire to move to strike out three of these paragraphs, and it will save time if I could let the one motion apply to all.

Mr. MANN. Well, we would not agree to that.

Mr. WINGO. Very well. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up time by discussing this proposition at length. At some future time I hope to do so, when the press of public business will permit it. I know that there are some arguments that can be made in behalf of our making expenditures of this kind. But unless I am badly deceived in the demands that are being made for this class of expenditures, in spite of anything that may be done, it is only a question of a few years when this Government is going to be expending a great many millions of dollars for foreign buildings for the housing of and for the maintenance of its embassies. Now, some gentleman suggested that I do not know what I am talking about. I suggest that I may have made more study of the question than the gentleman thinks. I do not undertake to arrogate to myself all information, as some gentlemen do, but I think that I know what is being demanded along this line, and I think I know enough about congressional legislation and congressional history to know what will be the result of these demands.

Now, you will start with Mexico, you will start with Japan, and you will start with Berne, and it will not be many years before you will come along with millions for other places. Now, it may be a wise expenditure, but I do not believe it is. I am not going to take up the time now to discuss it at length, because I frankly do not believe you are going to cut it out. I believe you have made up your mind to follow all this class of expenditure, not only here but further on.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman familiar with the law on the subject?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; I know the law. I am not going into the details of that.

Mr. MANN. I mean as to limiting the amount, and so forth.

Mr. WINGO. But Congress at any time can change the law. That is the very proposition I am getting to.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman, after a long experience, it is not easy to change the law and increase that amount.

Mr. WINGO. I know that may be true, but I think I see indications of a break in some quarters that have heretofore been opposed to this class of expenditures, and that is the only object I had in calling attention to it at this time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows, I assume, that this is the first item of the kind that was ever made under the law?

Mr. WINGO. Surely.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I have always rather agreed—I do not want to take the gentleman's time——

Mr. WINGO. My time is not very valuable. I gladly yield.

Mr. MANN. I always took the same position as the gentleman takes now, and feel not so very different from the way he does, although I have offered an amendment like this to the same item before. But we passed a law which seemed to be fairly well guarded, as a sort of agreed result of a long contest on the subject of foreign embassy buildings.

Mr. WINGO. I am familiar with them. I have read the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman read the RECORD on all of these contests, he was very busy for a number of years.

Mr. WINGO. I have wasted a good deal of my time since I was a young man reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am free to admit I did that.

Mr. MANN. That came in the end of what they called the Lowden bill—a provision not to exceed $500,000 a year, or $150,000 for any one building. That probably will not take care of some of the embassy buildings. Now, this is the first appropriation under it, after all, up to date. We have not been very extravagant about it.

Mr. WINGO. I have not said that; but I am speaking of my fears for the future.

Mr. MANN. As I drew that law for the purpose of preventing extravagance, I am inclined to think it possibly will.

Mr. WINGO. I hope it will, but I am afraid it will not.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that these provisions are put in this bill in accordance with the law referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, which authorizes this committee to report for embassy and legation buildings not exceeding $500,000 a year, and not exceeding $150,000 for any one building.

We have carried here $440,000. The question of making these appropriations has been thrashed out in Congress for years and years, and our committee reached the conclusion that it is the fixed purpose of Congress and the country to go on until we can have embassy and legation buildings in important capitals all over the world.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do.

Mr. WINGO. Do you think it wise for one Congress to undertake to map out a course for the future, where that course simply involves questions which each Congress can very intelligently determine for itself?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. But Congress did not undertake to bind any future Congress.

Mr. WINGO. Of course it could not.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It could not.

Mr. WINGO. But the argument that the gentleman is making is that this is justified under existing law, and you have fallen $60,000 short of the annual amount that you would have authority to make appropriation for. That is the argument you are making, that you are authorized by law; that Congress, you say, has adopted a policy—a past Congress has. Now, the question I want to ask you is this: Do you think it is wise for any Congress to undertake to bind—not legally, it is true, because that can not be done, but in moral effect—any succeeding Congress on a question of this kind?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think it is wise, because unless that law had been passed this item and the two succeeding items would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. WINGO. That is true.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The object in view in passing that law was not to bind a subsequent Congress, but to take it out of the power of one man to strike out these items on points of order, and thus make it possible for the committee to report and the House to pass these items.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The bar has already been laid down, and any man who is opposed to this kind of an expenditure can not make a point of order on it. The gap has been made, and now, as soon as you have made appropriations from year to year under the present existing law, does not the gentleman think there will be an incessant demand to change the present law so that future appropriations reported by the committee will be authorized for more extravagant sums?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think so. I do not think there is any question in the world about that, because I do not think you can build the proper kind of embassy buildings in certain capitals of the world for $150,000, and in that respect the law will have to be changed. But I believe it is the fixed purpose of people in this country who have thought deeply on this subject to have our Government acquire these permanent embassies and legations, so that men of moderate means can accept the highest diplomatic posts. That was the argument that was used when the law was passed, and I think it appeals strongly to the country. I think it is an argument that will justify this Congress in making the appropriations that are carried in this bill.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. I notice that this is the first appropriation for this general purpose that we have ever attempted to make. Is that correct?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is correct.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee what is the special propriety in beginning with Mexico, that country being, I believe, the only country of any importance on earth with which we have not now and have not had for about a year any regularly well-established international relations?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. This appropriation is not available until the 1st of July, and we expect by that time to reestablish peaceful relations with the Republic of Mexico and start to work putting up this embassy building.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, assure us that peace and tranquillity will be established by the 1st of July?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I can not assure the gentleman, but that is a reasonable expectation, and I entertain it.

Mr. SLOAN. Would it not be a pretty good idea to strike this out and wait and see, and first establish our embassies in the capitals of countries that we recognize?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No. I think that, with the prospect of a peaceful settlement of our difficulties in Mexico, it would be very unwise to strike it out.

Mr. SLOAN. Probably the gentleman has some special information on that?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Probably I have.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I want to call to the attention of Members who are not as thoroughly posted on the subject as is the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] that this great Government, composed of 100,000,000 people, doing the second greatest export business of the world, is humiliated in the eyes of every great nation by the fact that it has to house its diplomatic and consular agents in back rooms of unattractive buildings in some of the great capitals of the world.

We have not got embassy buildings located in any of the great capitals that compare with the dignity of this Nation. Smaller nations, like Switzerland and Holland and Italy, have embassy buildings located in various parts of the world in which to house their legations, and the American people, who ought to be in the forefront of all these enterprises, are compelled to rent the buildings in which to house their diplomatic and consular agents—a humiliating situation. Under those circumstances the United States Congress three or four years ago believed that the time had come when we ought to erect and own the homes of our diplomatic and consular force and not be humiliated by present conditions in this respect.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLINE. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. You say, "We have to rent." The ambassador has to rent.

Mr. CLINE. Yes; I am coming to that.

Mr. BARTLETT. We have not to rent at all. The ambassador has to rent.

Mr. CLINE. What is the result? Our ministers and ambassadors to Spain and Italy and Germany and France and those countries have to rent buildings where they live, and it costs those who go there to do the business of this great Government from $10,000 to $20,000 a year above their salaries for the hire of those quarters and to maintain the social standing necessary. Our representative at Buenos Aires is getting a small salary, and yet the cost of living there is so high that he is compelled to occupy quarters that cost him in the neighborhood of $3,000 or $4,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLINE. Now, Mr. Chairman, this economist from Arkansas is always talking about "saving the people's money" and about how proper it would be to look out for every expenditure. Let me call this economist's attention to what we could do. If we would hire the money at 3 per cent and build every one of these buildings that we need in the capitals of the world, it would be a saving, and it would open the avenue for appointment to these positions to men of small means, though capable, to reach those embassies and serve the United States, whereas under present conditions they can not do it.

That is the reason why the Congress provided in a small way $500,000 a year to begin this work. Why, gentlemen, that is only about one thirty-sixth of the amount we put into a battleship. We thought we might begin to build these buildings and locate our men in quarters comparable to the position we hold in the family of nations, and give ourselves some respectability and dignity, even if we have no respect for our standing abroad.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. CLINE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask the gentleman if this particular status of our relationship with the other countries does not make it almost impossible for any man, however able or eminent he might be, to serve our country in those foreign lands unless he has a competence?

Mr. CLINE. I just stated that. I will say to my friend from Ohio, the Executives of administrations for years and years back have been compelled to appeal in the selection of ministers and ambassadors to those men who had immense wealth to expend in addition to their small salary, because of the parsimonious way in which Congress has dealt with the subject. Not only is it patent that good men have refused to accept these positions on that account, but the present administration and the last administration have assigned the insufficient salary as the very reason why they could not find men to accept these positions. And yet the United States Government permits that kind of a condition to exist, and the Congress has refused to provide the necessary buildings where those men could go who are capable and able to represent us as well as men who have a vast amount of wealth.

Mr. FESS. That is not wise economy, is it?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly it is not.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. CLINE. Yes.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Can the gentleman from Indiana tell us what rental we now pay for the use of our building for the embassy at Mexico?

Mr. CLINE. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLINE. I do not know what the annual rental is, but I know that Mexico was selected by the State Department last year and recommended, and selected this year and recommended, because we had an extraordinary opportunity to get a very valuable piece of property with a good building on it for the sum of $150,000, a comparatively small sum considering its location in the capital of that country.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLINE. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that in most of the capitals of the world the hackmen are unable to tell visiting American citizens where the American embassy is or the American legation is, because it keeps moving around from one administration to another?

Mr. CLINE. That is particularly true in Switzerland, where the American people go by the thousands every year to visit that very notable country; and it has become a matter of public notice and comment in the press that the Government of the United States permits that kind of a condition to exist, that citizens of the United States when they wish to visit the American legation in Berne are unable to find it, because they can not find the rented quarters that it occupies, their representatives are compelled to shift quarters so frequently.

Mr. KAHN. And the gentleman is familiar with the fact that the newspapers recently printed long articles showing the difficulties encountered by gentlemen who had been appointed to foreign posts in trying to secure adequate quarters for their residences and offices.

Mr. CLINE. I am familiar with that fact, and I will say that my good friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] is a living and present witness to that condition, having been in Berne and having observed and become familiar with the conditions the gentleman relates. He testified to that fact before our committee, and recounted the difficulties that are attendant upon our present course of procedure.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman think that a diplomatic and consular officer of the United States, appointed to his post, could be better occupied in looking after the affairs of American citizens abroad than by chasing around trying to find suitable accommodations?

Mr. CLINE. Very much more so, and that is one reason why we included the authorization of these buildings in the present bill.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I want not only to subscribe to all my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. CLINE] has so well said, but to say that it seems to me that there are other very good reasons why these appropriations should be made in at least the amounts for which we have provided in this bill.

Answering the query of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] as to whether this was not the first step in letting down the bars for future expenditures of a similar nature, let me say that the law was put upon our statute books so that the bars could be let down. There would be no earthly object in two different Congresses considering this important matter and finally enacting it into law without there was also provided a means by which that law could be carried into execution; so that it is not a just criticism to say that we are letting down the bars, when we are for the first time only undertaking to give effect to its provisions.

Perhaps I attach too much weight and importance to the value of diplomacy as applied to our dealings with foreign powers, but I long ago became convinced that the ability and good sense of one diplomat in an important foreign post may at times be worth half a dozen battleships in maintaining peaceful relations, good will, and amity among nations. [Applause.] If we are to have our representatives live in such a manner as to comport not only with the dignity of the country but with the importance of their service, we ought as soon as practicable to house them in respectable quarters, so that the American flag shall fly over an embassy that is at least respectable and in keeping with the dignity of the great country which our ambassador represents. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we have embarked upon a new and increased sphere of action. I remember as a schoolboy that our geographies taught that the British Empire was so great in its territorial possessions that upon those possessions the sun never set. It seemed then that the time was remote, if indeed it was ever to come, when that would be true of our own country; but the kaleidoscopic events of the past 15 or 16 years growing out of the Spanish-American War have made us a good deal such a world power. While I do not know that I am literally correct in the assertion that we have already arrived at a point in our territorial expansion where the sun never sets upon our possessions, yet I do know that as a result of that war our obligations have been very greatly increased; substantially in the same proportion have the responsibilities and duties of our representatives abroad increased. [Applause.]

The declaration of Jefferson for "peace, commerce, and friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none," is as pertinent to-day as it was when those words fell from his lips. As a result of the Civil War we learned, though the lesson was taught through the sacrifice of the brave men of the North and the South, that henceforth and for all time our country must be one and indissoluble. Only the red hand of anarchy can threaten danger from within; and with that force the power of both State and National Governments should never temporize for a moment. The only danger, then, that will threaten the perpetuity of our Republic must come from without—across the seas. Under such conditions is it not a mistaken conception of economy to refuse to most generously appropriate money for any purpose that shall have for its object the strengthening of our diplomatic relations with foreign powers? Indeed, to my mind all of those provisions of the present bill which appropriate money—it is true, in small sums—for the purpose of participating as a member of the different international commissions and congresses therein mentioned are helpful agencies in maintaining cordial relations with those powers, and this even though the particular cause for which they have been called may not be materially advanced.

While lack of time prevents me considering also what may be termed the purely commercial phase of our Diplomatic and Consular Service as calling for liberal recognition of our representatives engaged in those fields, yet I hope on some other occasion to speak at some length upon the need of greatly improving that work if we would take our share of supplying the world's markets. That it is the earnest purpose of the administration to bring about these results, both in the interest of a world-wide peace as well as to develop our foreign trade, I am pleased to believe.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires at this point to recognize some gentleman in favor of the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. There is no one who wishes to speak in favor of the amendment.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia have five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I do not care to get the floor in that way, although I thank the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. I move to strike out the last three words of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Arkansas is to strike out the paragraph. There is no last word.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I am not going to get the floor in that way. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment, and I ask to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the bill to authorize the acquisition of sites and to erect proper homes for our ambassadors and diplomatic representatives accredited to foreign countries. I do not think the proper ground for such action should be because of the results of the Spanish-American War or because we have since then become a world power. I think we would be entitled to much more consideration and respect from the powers abroad if we did not claim for ourselves to be a world power. We are the representatives of the sublimest effort that ever emanated from the mind of man to establish in the world a republic that would endure for all the ages; and it is because we are the representatives of the great Republic that has lived for more than 130 years, and that we, and those who are lovers of freedom, hope will endure for all the years to come, that we are entitled to our own self-respect and to the respect and admiration of the people of other countries; not because of any princely or royal powers, but because we have become the mightiest free Republic of constitutional government that ever was created in all the history of the world.

It is due to our people and Government, the greatest Nation on the face of the earth, representing the greatest principle of liberty and self-government of any people since time began, that we should provide for those whom we send abroad as our representatives in decent and respectable homes and give them money enough to live decently and respectably upon, in accord with the station and rank they should occupy.

What is the condition of affairs? Take the great office of our ambassador to France, at Paris. Why, we have there now a representative of this Government, a gentleman of highest qualifications, who has discharged the duties of that office most efficiently and creditably to himself and the country. But he is a man of large fortune and can afford it. Why, Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that he pays more for the rent of the house in which he lives than twice the amount of the salary that he receives from this Government. It is because he is a patriotic American citizen, imbued with the idea of properly representing the people of this great Government, that he is willing, out of his ample fortune, to provide a decent and respectable place to reside in and entertain and receive the people of other countries and Americans who may happen to be in Paris upon business or otherwise.

What is the result? Time and again during this administration the position of ambassador to France has been offered to distinguished Democrats, and yet not one has been able to accept it. Why, does not everybody believe that any man ought to be glad of the opportunity to serve his country in that great office, but that no man has been found in the Democratic ranks able to afford, for the sake of the honor and dignity of the office, to expend from his private fortune the amount necessary to meet the expense incident to the proper discharge of the duties and responsibilities of this office?

Take the position of ambassador to London. We have the same public office for officials over there that we have had for a number of years. I have seen in the press recently that we have been notified that we must soon find other quarters.

Mr. MADDEN. But the Government pays the expenses of that office, so that it does not embarrass the ambassador.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman mean the removal of the office?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The people who own the property have notified the London ambassador that they can not longer occupy that office.

Mr. MADDEN. That is done everywhere, and we do it here.

Mr. BARTLETT. I was not ignorant of the fact that the gentleman from Illinois calls attention to. I called attention to it for the purpose of asserting that this Congress ought long ago to have made the necessary appropriation, not only for a building for the ambassador in Mexico, Japan, and Switzerland, but in all the other great countries where we send our ambassadors to represent this country, and that it is not unnecessary extravagance to do so, but it is false economy to fail to do so.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no doubt the gentleman does. While I am in favor of not expending any more money than necessary to carry on the government economically administered, yet I know that the people I represent, whether they be merchants or bankers or men who work in the shop or men who plow the soil and raise the crop, would be willing that this Government should expend the amount necessary to properly house and take care of its representatives abroad that they may live in a manner as becoming the dignity and greatness and worth of our great Republic, the last and crowning effort on the part of humanity to establish forever and perpetuate the greatest Government and Republic ever devised in the mind of man, founded and building for human liberty, and around which I believe the lightnings of eternity will play. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Are we not doing our full duty in spending $500,000 a year for the construction of embassies?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think we are doing all we can do under the present state of the law. I was not complaining or criticizing the committee, but was asserting that it was a false economy that this had not long ago been done, and that it would be economy now to return to the old plan as is proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Acquisition of embassy premises, Tokyo, Japan: For the construction of a building on ground now held by the Government of the United States at Tokyo, Japan, for the use of the embassy to Japan, both as a residence of the diplomatic officers and for the offices of the embassy, and for furnishing the same, $150,000.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 22, by striking out lines 11 to 16, inclusive.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I had no idea of provoking such a discussion on this matter. I doubt very seriously if I had known that I would provoke the criticism that was made I would have had the temerity to raise this question. But, in passing, I want to thank my distinguished, genial, courteous, and amiable friend from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] for the compliment he paid me. It was so unexpected and so extravagant that I fear the ordinary person will think there was collusion between us.

I recognize the fact, and I have said so before, that there are good arguments in favor of the existing law on these appropriations. The thing I am afraid of is the extravagance it is going to lead to. My fears are justified by the utterances of every speaker to-day who is chafing at the limitations of the present law. One says that no patriotic citizen favors limiting it to what it is now. An humble Member moved to strike out what he thought was an unwise appropriation, and it provoked several Members to rise in defense of the item, which shows that there is some ground for fear that in the future you are going to change the present law by raising the present half-million-dollar limit. You can make the arguments that have been made, and it will not be many years before they will say that the dignity of this great Republic requires that we appropriate money to buy the grape juice which the diplomats drink and the knee breeches they wear. I was surprised at the defense of $150,000 for Mexico City. What do you need it for? It will be a waste of money. Is there any man here believes that you are going to need a building down in Mexico City for many years? Is there any man here who doubts what the future is with reference to Mexico? If he does he is more of an optimist than I. We may patch up peace now.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the gentleman's idea?

Mr. WINGO. I do not know whether I should have the temerity to state it, because some gentlemen may see fit to scold me because I have the audacity to express an opinion; but as the gentleman has asked for it, I will give it to him. We may be able to patch up peace now, but the history of Mexico shows what? The history of Mexico for 400 years has been one of strife, revolution, anarchy, and despotism. I do not want war; I hope it can be averted; but I fear we shall never have permanent peace and order in Mexico until we take possession of that country. Whether it be wise, whether it be proper, whether it be good for the ultimate welfare of this Republic, is not the question. I think I know the temper of the American people; I think I know the temper of the Anglo-Saxon; I think I have read correctly the history of this country; and, whether you do it this year or next, it is only a question of time when this country will extend to the Panama Canal. We will take the border with us when we cross the Rio Grande.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. With pleasure.

Mr. KAHN. I take it, then, that the gentleman is not in accord with the President's Mobile speech?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, it would serve no useful purpose to discuss that speech; but whether I agree with it or not, I agree with him in his efforts to maintain peace, and I think it is the duty of everyone to hold up his hands in his efforts to bring order out of chaos. I hope it may yet be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. My friend from Arkansas is objecting to the expense of erecting these buildings. I suppose he knows, of course, that there are not any more than about 25 necessary, and, counting each one at $200,000, that would make a total expense of only $5,000,000. How much does he think an expedition to Mexico for the purpose of subduing that people and making the country American territory would cost?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, that is a thing that appalls me. That is a thing that makes me hope that the President can yet bring peace out of the present situation. I am expressing my fears, and not my wishes. I think everyone has the same fear that I have. I dread war. I do not want war. The terrific toll of life and property is something that appalls any man when he contemplates it, and no one would do anything to bring on a war. I pray for peace, but I expect ultimately we will have war; I expect ultimately we are going to have to go in there, and why? We have a turbulent neighbor.

The history of that country shows that it is going to continue so. Whether you agree with the Monroe doctrine or not, we all know that this Nation is always going to insist on order in Mexico. We have gone too far on this occasion to ever retrace our steps with reference to that. I say that in the course of time we are going to take that country, so what is the use of wasting money down there? I agree with the gentleman that if we are going into this policy at all we should select the most practicable places and start right. Now, as to the gentleman's statement with reference to the cost of buildings, I desire to say this: After you once start and get an embassy, in a few years you will come to the conclusion that you have not as good a one as some other nation, and then some gentleman will appeal to our sense of pride, and you will demand a better palace for your representative, and then you will demand an annex, and then you will demand appropriations for certain expenses, for household expenses, and servants, and all those other things. That is the trouble, and that is the fear that I have.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, if we erected a palace in all of the 25 countries where we ought to erect embassies, the whole thing would not cost more than the cost of one battleship.

Mr. WINGO. That may be true, but not my conception of a palace. The public buildings in this country cost from five to ten million dollars each, and I think if you are going to follow your policy and are sincere and keep up with the other nations, in a few years' time you will be asking for several millions for Paris, for Madrid, for Berlin, and for London.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Acquisition of embassy premises at Berne, Switzerland: For the purchase of a site and the construction of a building thereon at the city of Berne, Switzerland, and for the furnishing of the building, or, as to the Secretary of State may seem best, for the purchase at said city of a site and a building already erected, and for the alteration, repair, and furnishing of such building and the construction of an addition thereto, if necessary, for the use of the embassy to Switzerland, both as the residence of the diplomatic officials and for the offices of the embassy, $140,000.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 22, by striking out the paragraph beginning with line 17 and ending with line 26.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I am so anxious to pass the appropriation bills and the antitrust bills and go home that I am not going to take up any time in discussion of this amendment, because it is the same that we have just been discussing.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill with reference to the language used in this item and some of the others. I notice in the provision for an embassy building at Mexico it reads that it shall be used as the residence of the diplomatic "officials." In the provision for the embassy at Tokyo the language is that it shall be used as the residence of the diplomatic "officers," and in the provision for the residence at Berne the language is diplomatic "officials." Is there any purpose in making the distinction between diplomatic "officers" at Japan on the other side of the world and diplomatic "officials" in Mexico and at Berne?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. None whatever.

Mr. MANN. I take it the committee used the language sent in the estimates, but I did not know whether the distinguished Secretary of State drew a distinction.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Not at all. We intend to have it for the residence and offices of the diplomatic corps at both places, the residence of the ambassador or minster at each place.

Mr. MANN. I took the trouble a moment ago to look at the dictionary that is official in the House here—I think it is the Standard Dictionary—as to the meaning of the word "embassy," and I find it is the residence of an ambassador. As we have no ambassador to Switzerland, should not that language be changed to conform with the title of the official or office of the minister or envoy, which I think is ordinarily called a legation?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. "Acquisition of legation premises" would be the better phrase.

Mr. MANN. Acquisition of legation premises at Berne, Switzerland.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; that is it.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to make a distinction.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is right. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 17, by striking out the word "embassy" and inserting the word "legation."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 22, line 11, by striking out the word "embassy" and inserting the word "legation."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Then, in line 26, there should be the same amendment at the end of the line.

Mr. KAHN. Also in line 24.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 22, line 26, by striking out the word "embassy" and inserting the word "legation."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. And also in line 24.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 24, page 22, strike out the word "embassy" and insert the word "legation."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The next paragraph pertains to one of our international commissions.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will indulge the Chair, the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas is to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MOORE. I thought that had been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WINGO. Not officially.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. During the pendency of the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas to strike out the paragraph there was a motion made by the gentleman from Virginia to change certain language in the paragraph, and I desire to know if that was a proper parliamentary proceeding?

The CHAIRMAN. Generally speaking, the Chair will state it is proper for a gentleman in charge of a bill to correct the language of the text, and the Chair understands that was the purpose of the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FOWLER. It was not, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, offered as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that it was a motion to perfect the paragraph. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 2, noes 26.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In 1902 an act was passed making permanent annual appropriations for the purpose of an international navigation congress to which the United States is attached by what is called the American section. I have been unable to find just where the annual appropriation is provided for, but I understood it usually was taken care of in this bill. Is the gentleman from Virginia informed as to that?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It is not carried in this bill.

Mr. MOORE. There is an annual appropriation of $3,000 for the American section of the International Navigation Congress. It is such a congress as is usually provided for in this bill, and I would like to know whether it has been carried heretofore in this bill.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It has not for some years. It was not last year, and is not this year.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman know where it is carried?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; I do not.

Mr. MOORE. There is to be an international congress in Sweden, I think, next year, at which the United States will be represented.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. We will look that up and carry it in the next bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

International Commisssion on Public and Private International Law: For the payment of compensation to, and the necessary expenses of, the representative or representatives of the United States on the International Commission of Jurists, organized under the convention signed at the Third International American Conference August 23, 1906, approved by the Senate February 3, 1908, and ratified by the President February 8, 1908, for the purpose of preparing drafts of codes of public and private international law; and for the payment of the quota of the United States of the expenses incident to the preparation of such drafts, including the compensation of experts under article 4 of the convention, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available and to continue available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. Is there any special reason for this appropriation to be immediately available?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; there is not.

Mr. MANN. I would like to make this suggestion to the gentleman: I suppose this is in the form of the estimates sent down, and provides for an appropriation of $20,000, "or so much thereof as may be necessary." That language means nothing. It is not customary to put that in an appropriation. They are not required to use the $20,000, and if it is not used, of course, under the law, that goes back into the Treasury and lapses after a certain length of time.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Of course, any appropriation under this bill, unless specifically directed, lapses into the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The committee dropped into putting that language in there by reason of the fact that under the act of March 2, 1909, an appropriation of $10,000 was made for this purpose. It was not used, and lapsed; and the department thinks $10,000 is not enough now, but think they will need somewhere between $10,000 and $20,000.

Mr. MANN. But you can not make an appropriation between $10,000 and $20,000. It lumbers up the statutes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman is correct about the suggestion in reference to the language.

Mr. MANN. If there is no special reason for making it immediately available, I suggest to the gentleman that he strike out all after "$20,000." The words "and to continue available during the fiscal year ending June 30" are unnecessary. That is what the appropriation is for.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all the language, page 23, line 14, after "$20,000" down to and including line 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his pro forma amendment, and the gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 23, by striking out all of line 14 after "$20,000" and lines 15, 16, and 17.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXPENSES OF CONSULAR INSPECTORS.

For the actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses of consular inspectors while traveling and inspecting under instructions from the Secretary of State, $15,000.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I desire to ask him what are the duties of these five consular inspectors.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They go all over the world and inspect the consulates and make reports to the State Department. They were created by an act of 1906, after there had been great complaint about the condition in the consulates in certain parts of the world. These officers were established as inspectors.

Mr. CULLOP. Does anybody have authority to inspect them, or are they free from any inspection?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They are subject to inspection by the Secretary of State and officials of the State Department.

Mr. CULLOP. Is this the salary they have been receiving heretofore?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They have received that from the time the offices were instituted in 1906.

Mr. CULLOP. Was that salary named in the law?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They are named in the law. When the Consular Service was reorganized in 1906 these salaries were fixed in that law.

Mr. CULLOP. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

REMISSION OF PORTION OF CHINESE INDEMNITY.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer from the sum of $2,000,000, reserved from the "Chinese indemnity, 1900," by provisions of the joint resolution of May 25, 1908, and place to the credit of the fund for "defending suits in claims against the United States" such sums as the Attorney General may from time to time certify to said Secretary as having been expended under his authority and direction in defending claims of citizens of the United States against said Chinese indemnity fund in the Court of Claims of the United States, exclusive of salaries; also that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the credit of the said Court of Claims with the Public Printer, from the said reservation of $2,000,000, upon the certificate of the chief justice of the said court, such sums as the said court may have spent, or shall hereafter spend, for printing testimony in the trial of the said claims; and further, that there shall be allowed as costs in the suits in which recoveries have been, or may hereafter be, had under the said joint resolution of May 25, 1908, such expenses of the claimants, including reasonable counsel fees, as the said Court of Claims may adjudge to be fair and just, and such costs so allowed shall be paid out of the said reserved sum of $2,000,000 by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the certificate of the said court: Provided, That within three months from the passage of this act applications for such costs shall be filed as supplementary motions in the said court by or on behalf of the persons who have recovered judgments under the said joint resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I will just ask the gentleman to reserve it. I concede the point of order, but the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND] wishes to submit some remarks on the subject.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The point of order has been conceded.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants to submit remarks, I do not know that I have any objection; but probably I will wish to submit some remarks on the other side, and the result will be probably that the bill will not pass to-day. I thought the gentlemen were very anxious to pass it to-day.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman only cares for about three minutes.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how much time he will want after I speak for five minutes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. After he speaks the point of order will be held good.

Mr. MANN. I have reserved the point of order. If I allow somebody to attack my position on this, I probably will want to defend it. It is an old, old matter, you know. I will withhold the point of order so that I may have the pleasure of hearing my distinguished friend from New Jersey.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is very kind of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. That is not kindness at all. It is simply a desire to hear the gentleman speak, which I always like to do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What I shall say I shall predicate on the fact that the chairman of the committee has accepted the point of order.

Mr. MANN. About which there is no doubt.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, the Representative from Illinois [Mr. MANN] by employing a technicality has, to the extent of his power, checked the regular employment of American labor at good wages.

This provision which he has stricken out of this bill was intended to be an act of justice to a number of American citizens engaged in commerce in China and Japan. They suffered great loss through the activities resulting from the anti-foreign Boxer uprising in China. Among those who suffered from that uprising was an old-established American commercial firm known as the Japan & China Trading Co. For nearly half a century its business was conducted in Boston, but for a number of years it has been conducted in New York. This company annually exports to China and Japan many million dollars' worth of American products to be consumed or used in those foreign countries. I know of no means by which American labor can be kept constantly and profitably employed better than by the extension of the use or consumption in foreign countries of the things those laborers make or produce, be they farmers or skilled workmen.

If the voters of the district represented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] approve his action in employing his technicalities to decrease their employment, they are less intelligent than I believe them to be. He has stricken from this bill a provision designed to reimburse an American trading company of long and honorable career for losses it sustained through the antiforeign riots following the Boxer rebellion in China. That American company, as I have suggested, has for nearly three-quarters of a century supplied an outlet in foreign countries for the products of the laborers employed in this country; it has exported many millions of dollars' worth of the products of American labor for use or consumption in the Far East. In doing so it has helped to keep employed American workmen. But the Representative from Illinois [Mr. MANN], proudly employing his power as the leader of the Republican minority, resorts to a mere technicality to prevent this old and honorable trading company from recovering from China a part of the loss it sustained through the Chinese riots. I do not believe his voters who labor will approve his act in this respect. I believe his voters, the laboring men of his district, want these trading companies, who export their products, encouraged instead of discouraged. He has the power—any Member on the floor has the power—to block this act of justice; but I believe the voters of his district will not indorse his action in checking the steady employment of American labor at good wages.

It may be that the voters in the district represented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] are satisfied with his use of his power, with the use of a technicality here, to check the industries in this country in which many of those voters are employed, industries which are quickened and enlarged by the use or consumption of their products in foreign lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing that my distinguished friend from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND] should, during the campaign, come out and read to the voters of my district, as he has read to the committee, this little speech prepared by him or some one else. It sounds so nicely, however, that I think he must have prepared it himself. What are the facts in the case? For the first time, I think, in the history of the Government a company that had a claim against a foreign Government, after having been protected by our Government and had the claim paid, has the extreme gall to come before Congress and ask to have its counsel fees paid.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman submit to an interruption?

Mr. MANN. I will; but I did not interrupt the gentleman, although he put in his whole time abusing me.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was merely stating some economic facts; that was all. If the gentleman from Illinois is mixed up in the facts it is his fault, not mine.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was not stating economic facts at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the gentleman does not agree with those facts, it is not my fault.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has the gentleman any evidence of the fact he has asserted just now, that these claimants want their counsel fees only paid?

Mr. MANN. Did I say "counsel fees only"?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understood the gentleman so to say.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman deny that they want their counsel fees paid?

Mr. TOWNSEND. So far as the company mentioned by me is concerned, the counsel fees were paid long ago, and I have a letter telling me that they have been.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; they have paid their counsel.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. But they want the Government now to refund to them the money for the fees that they paid their counsel. Does the gentleman deny it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The purpose for which this money was to be used was to place these American merchants as nearly as possible in the position they were in before the Boxer uprising. If they are not allowed the cost of presenting their claims before the Court of Claims, they are out just the amount of the cost of presenting their claims—a very serious charge upon them.

Mr. MANN. I was afraid, when I agreed to withhold my point of order, that this debate would take all afternoon. But I would like to use just one moment of my time. We received from China an indemnity fund and paid the claims of American citizens out of that fund, and then we proposed to refund to China, as an exemplification of our great affection for China and of our natural generosity, the balance of the fund. But because a little of it was retained in the Treasury pending the final settlement of these claims, this great company and other great companies who had had their claims paid out of this fund by the Government of the United States now ask that we pay their counsel fees.

That is nerve and gall so extreme that I am surprised that anybody would propose it in the American Congress. It has had support at different times. I am willing at any time to discuss that matter before the House on the various bills and joint resolutions which have been reported from time to time, but I have always objected to passing the claim by unanimous consent and to setting the precedent that the Government of the United States, when it secures the payment of a claim for any of our citizens, shall in addition pay the lawyers' fees in connection with it. That is not done in any court in the land, although occasionally a small amount of lawyers' fees may be taxed as costs. But these people want to have all their expenses in connection with making their claim and their lawyers' fees paid by the Government of the United States out of this fund. I think it is gall enough, and so I make a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order on the paragraph. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FIFTEENTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS AGAINST ALCOHOLISM.

For the purpose of defraying the expenses incident to the Fifteenth International Congress Against Alcoholism to be held in the United States in 1915, $40,000, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe. The Secretary of State is hereby authorized and requested to extend an invitation to the Governments of the world with which we maintain diplomatic relations to participate in and appoint delegates to said congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina rose.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] makes a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is getting late, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think it is advisable to consume much time——

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, as a member of this committee, I would like, out of courtesy, to be heard briefly upon this paragraph. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to accommodate the gentleman for a brief time, but it may provoke debate. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SHARP. About five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think it is very important that this bill should be gotten through. The House agreed yesterday to adjourn to-day at half past 2. I do not object to debate on the paragraph if it is in order, but——

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall have no objection to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] extending his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman withhold his point for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall reserve my point of order for three minutes if the gentleman from Ohio is the only gentleman who wishes to speak.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will withhold his point of order for longer than five minutes. In order to economize time, I have sat here during the discussion of the bill and have not moved to strike out the last word of any paragraph, because I did not want to prevent the passage of the bill to-day, but inasmuch as——

Mr. MANN. It was understood that the House would adjourn to-day about 2 o'clock. There was an agreement that the House should adjourn at 2.30. How much time does the gentleman from South Carolina desire?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Five minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to obstruct the passage of this bill or to delay it beyond a little time. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] seems determined to insist upon his point of order, I shall ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the extension of my remarks a letter of the Secretary of State, William J. Bryan, to the chairman of our committee, Mr. FLOOD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, the committee is well aware that the point of order raised against this section by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is well taken in a parliamentary sense, and if insisted upon must go out of the bill. I regret very much that the gentleman has seen fit to object to this particular provision. A more careful examination of the bill will show that, as a matter of fact, there are several other provisions authorizing the appropriation of money for the holding of international conferences for different purposes that are subject also to this same point of order, notably the Fifth Conference American States, Second Pan American Scientific Congress, and Nineteenth Conference Interparliamentary Union.

It will be further observed that in three out of four of these cases, including the present one under consideration, these conventions are to be next held in our own country. The exception is the convention of the Fifth Conference American States, to be held in Santiago, Chile. It would seem to me that for this reason alone objection should not be made to this provision.

As favoring the holding of the International Congress Against Alcoholism in the year 1915 in the United States, I will insert the following letter from Secretary of State W. J. Bryan:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 18, 1914.

Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FLOOD: I beg to submit herewith a draft of an amendment which the President desires inserted at the proper place in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bills. It is intended to appropriate the sum of $50,000 for the purpose of entertaining the International Congress on Alcoholism, which is to meet in the United States in 1915. We have been sending delegates to this congress at meetings in Europe, and it is thought proper to make this provision for the entertainment of the congress when it meets in this country.

Very truly, yours,

W. J. BRYAN.

Inasmuch as I feel confident that the gentleman's point of order against the bill by no means finally disposes of the matter, I am not now going to make any extended reference as to what has been accomplished by this International Congress Against Alcoholism in years past. That it deals, however, with a subject that is of increasing importance no one will deny. For many years past these congresses have been held, I believe, each alternate year in foreign capitals, and it is a matter of no little gratification that our delegates to the last convention at Milan, Italy, succeeded in having the convention agree to meet in our own country the next time.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, the point of order raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] on the last paragraph of this bill will, of course, go unchallenged. But, Mr. Chairman, it seems extraordinary that objection should be raised to the appropriation named, considering the character of the service which would be rendered the country by this international congress against alcoholism.

Foreign countries for years have met the expense incident to these international congresses, and now that the United States, through the efforts of our representatives at the Milan meeting of 1913, is to have the meeting this year it is entirely within the keeping of propriety to, and as a matter of fact we should, provide expense for the necessary arrangements attendant upon the meeting.

It is fitting that our Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, whose high standards of character commend him to our people in public as well as private life, however much we may disagree with him in politics, should be designated by act of Congress to extend an invitation to the Governments of the world to participate in and appoint delegates to the Fifteenth International Congress Against Alcoholism.

We hope legislation may yet be passed this session providing for this arrangement.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is pending to the paragraph. Does the gentleman from Virginia concede it?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes. All I wanted to say, Mr. Chairman, was what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] would have said if he had had the opportunity, and if we had time I think we could convince the gentleman from Wisconsin that he ought not to make a point of order against the item. We concede that the point of order is well taken, but I shall not discuss it to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FINLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15762) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi, for two weeks, on account of sickness.

To Mr. QUIN, for a few days, on account of official duties on special committee work of the Military Affairs Committee at West Point.

To Mr. CASEY, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CARAWAY, on account of important business.

To Mr. JACOWAY, on account of illness in family.

ACTS OF THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF PORTO RICO (H. DOC. NO. 979).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 31 of the act of Congress approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith copies of the acts and resolutions enacted by the Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico during the regular session beginning January 12 and ending March 12, 1914, and the extraordinary session beginning March 14 and ending March 26, 1914.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF MUSICAL SCIENCE AND HISTORY (H. DOC. NO. 978).

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of a provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "thereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law," I transmit herewith, for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of the French Republic to that of the United States to send delegates to an international congress of musical science and history to be held at Paris in June next, and a letter from the Librarian of Congress showing the favor with which he views the proposed gathering.

It will be observed that the acceptance of this invitation involves no appropriation of public moneys.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 16, 1914.

The SPEAKER. This message and the accompanying documents will be ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think that ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations. It is a deficiency matter.

The SPEAKER. It does not ask for any appropriation.

Mr. MANN. This is a question of accepting an invitation, is it not?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It ought to go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in conversation with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs a moment ago, asked him whether a similar message had been referred to his committee, and he said not.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I beg the pardon of the Chair. I misunderstood him. I understood him to ask me if this message had been referred to our committee.

The SPEAKER. No. All the Speaker wishes is to secure uniform action on these matters.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. All these matters go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The message and the accompanying documents, which are short, will be ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the subject which I discussed yesterday afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in connection with the subject which he discussed yesterday afternoon. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, May 18, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 18, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in all our undertakings we seek Thy guidance and blessing. We would be saved from the tragedy of prayerless lives, which would shut our eyes against Thy light and shut ourselves out into the infinite darkness. In Thy light we shall see light. We pray that Thou wilt lift up the light of Thy countenance upon us. If the light that is in us be darkness, how great is that darkness. O do Thou give us that divine illumination which will make clear and bright the path of life, that we may follow that way which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—TARIFF DUTY ON SUGAR.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. In the Washington Post, a newspaper published in this city, there appeared on yesterday, the 17th instant, an article entitled "Ruled by Secrecy and Threats," and so forth, purporting to be a dispatch from James Creelman to the Evening Mail, of New York City, from which I ask the Secretary to read certain references to myself, which I have marked in the article I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE OF PATRONAGE.

Business is halted all over the country. Multitudes have been thrown out of work. The Nation has been brought to the verge of war. But something like two-thirds of the presidential patronage is still held in reserve in Mr. Wilson's hands, and he is not averse to saying to a Congressman who hesitates in voting that he is willing to allow that Congressman's constituents to decide as to which of them is the party leader.

In searching for an explanation of the extraordinary power of the President over the unwilling Members of Congress I learned to-day the exact details of his attempt to force the Louisiana Senators to vote for free sugar in the tariff bill.

To understand the true significance of this scene it must be understood that the free-sugar schedule has already caused a loss of about $30,000,000 to Louisiana, and that it is estimated that the loss in the ruination of sugar-producing properties will reach $100,000,000 before the end of the year.

When the free-sugar schedule was under consideration Mr. Wilson asked Senator RANSDELL, of Louisiana; Mr. Ewing, the Louisiana national committeeman; and Representative BROUSSARD, of the same State, to come to the White House.

At that time the whole people of Louisiana were in a state of wild alarm over the prospect of the overwhelming State calamity involved in the free sugar scheme.

The Louisiana Democratic leaders had announced that Mr. Wilson had given his word that the Democratic platform promise that tariff changes were to be effected without injuring or destroying any legitimate industry was intended to apply to the sugar industry.

When Senator RANSDELL, Representative BROUSSARD, and Mr. Ewing reached the White House President Wilson asked Senator RANSDELL to vote for free sugar.

The Senator declared that he had made a solemn promise to his constituents to oppose free sugar, and that he could not violate his pledged word or betray the people he represented in the Senate.

THE PRESIDENT'S DEMAND.

Mr. Wilson then turned to Representative BROUSSARD and asked him to get Mr. THORNTON, the other Louisiana Senator, to vote for free sugar.

Mr. BROUSSARD said that Senator THORNTON was publicly pledged against free sugar, and that as he himself had also promised to oppose it it would be treason to his constituents to do as the President asked.

For an hour the Louisianians earnestly pictured to the President the great disaster to their State which would follow the removal of the protective duty on sugar.

In the end Mr. Wilson again asked Senator RANSDELL to vote for free sugar, saying that no individual Senator had the right to blockade a great party program, and once more Senator RANSDELL said that he would not violate his word or betray the interests of his constituents.

Then the President stood up. There was a smile on his face, but a cold look in his eyes and a hard ring in his voice.

"Very well, Senator," he said, "then you and I must, as it were, 'go to the mat'; but I want to let you know that if we are to fight it out I shall use every weapon at my command."

This direct presidential threat to a United States Senator concerning his vote—and I give literally the account of an eyewitness—and the fact that Mr. Wilson has reserved the bulk of his patronage for use at will may partly explain the otherwise unaccountable failure of the profoundly dissatisfied Democrats in Congress from breaking into open revolt as they see the widespread signs of approaching Democratic defeat at the polls.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I do not know who furnished Mr. Creelman his information, but I can not, in justice to all concerned, permit this statement to pass without an explanation of the real facts.

There were several interviews last year between President Wilson and myself in regard to the tariff on sugar, and he endeavored to persuade me that party loyalty required me to vote for the tariff bill. I replied that it would be impossible to do so if sugar were placed on the free list, as I had made repeated pledges to the people of Louisiana during my campaign for the Senate in 1911 and 1912 that if elected I would do everything possible to retain a reasonable duty on sugar, and I felt in honor bound to carry out those promises on the faith of which many persons in the sugar section of the State had supported me.

At the meeting referred to between the President, Col. Ewing, Mr. BROUSSARD, and myself, the main point discussed was whether sugar should be placed on the free list at once or after the lapse of three years. Col. Ewing, Mr. BROUSSARD, and I all made strong pleas for a delay of three years in the maturity of the free-sugar clause, and, without securing any promise to that effect from Mr. Wilson, we left him under the belief that sugar would not be free for three years.

I can not recall everything said by the President at this meeting and on the other occasions when we discussed the tariff, but I am sure he never attempted to coerce me by threats in regard to patronage or otherwise. He presented his views forcibly, as he always does and as he had a right to do, and I replied in like manner, but there was no unpleasantness between us.

Since Mr. Wilson's inauguration there have been vacancies in four presidential offices in Louisiana which are regarded as senatorial patronage—two district attorneys, a United States marshal, and collector of internal revenue—all four of which have been filled by the advice and to the entire satisfaction of Senator THORNTON and myself. The highest salaried of these positions—internal-revenue collector—was given to my very intimate friend, John Fauntleroy, about two months ago at my special request. Moreover, the six officials appointed by the Treasury Department under the income-tax service in Louisiana were selected on the suggestion of Senator THORNTON and myself, and neither of us has any complaint on the score of patronage.

LOCATION OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the reserve bank organization committee, transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 14, 1914, copies of briefs and written arguments made by each city applying for the location of a Federal reserve bank, together with a poll of the votes taken by the banks and the reasons relied upon by the organization committee in fixing the boundaries of reserve districts and locating the reserve cities, and so forth.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the usual number of the communication may be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the communication will be printed and lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 15762) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Whereas industrial and mercantile enterprises, legitimate and beneficial in their relation to all the people, are being prosecuted under a strained and forced application of existing law, sufficient for the proper regulation of business if wisely and temperately administered:

Resolved, That the Rochester Chamber of Commerce, being opposed not only to the trade-commission bill but also to the so-called omnibus antitrust bill, as unnecessary, harrassing, and harmful to legitimate business, refrains from voting on referendum No. 7, except to protest vigorously against the recommendation of the special committee that the bill be enacted into law.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, Sunday, May 17, 1914.]

SCORES O'GORMAN TOLLS ARGUMENT.

(By Crammond Kennedy.)

To the editor of the Washington Herald:

Senator O'GORMAN builds up his argument in favor of exemption from Panama Canal tolls on a narrow and insecure foundation. In order to show that vessels in the coastwise trade are not included in the phrase "vessels of commerce and war" as used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the learned Senator says, "There is a manifest distinction between vessels of commerce and 'coastwise trade,'" and then he cites a definition of commerce from Wharton's Law Dictionary to the effect that "commerce relates to our dealings with foreign nations, colonies, etc.," and trade "to mutual dealings at home." He cites also the Encyclopedia Britannica and the International Encyclopedia to the same effect, and, assuming that these "British authorities" furnish conclusive tests of the sense in which the phrase "vessels of commerce" is used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, he says:

"A 'vessel of commerce' is therefore a vessel engaged in international trade."

This sounds quite conclusive, but it depends, of course, on the conclusiveness and relevancy of the authorities cited. The Encyclopedic Dictionary defines commerce as "trade, traffic; the exchange of articles for each other or money"; and adds that "when the word is used with an extended meaning it signifies mutual exchange, buying and selling, whether abroad or at home."

MEANING IS DOUBLE.

So in the Century Dictionary (cited in 133 Ind., 60, 93; 18 L. R. A., 502) commerce is defined as—

"Interchange of goods, merchandise, or property of any kind; trade; traffic; used more especially of trade on a large scale, carried on by transportation of merchandise between different countries or between different parts of the same country, distinguished as foreign commerce and internal commerce."

It is only in a limited sense that commerce means foreign or colonial trade. In a general sense commerce and trade are used interchangeably for traffic in merchandise at home and abroad. Thus, in his "Advice to Sir George Villiers," Lord Bacon used "trade" in the sense of domestic and foreign commerce:

"I come," he said, "to the sixth part, which is trade, and that is either at home or abroad. And I begin with that which is at home, which enableth the subjects of the kingdom to live and layeth a foundation to a foreign trade, by traffic with others, which enableth them to live plentifully and happily."

The American Yearbook treats of "domestic commerce on the canals," "coastwise commerce," and "commerce on the Great Lakes," as well as "foreign commerce." And Senator O'GORMAN himself, in a subsequent part of his argument, says that "the domestic commerce of the United States exceeds that of any other nation," and that "more than 40,000,000 tons passed through the Soo Canal in 1912."

ANSWER IS CONSTITUTION.

But we have the highest legal authority for the proposition that the meaning of "commerce" can not be confined, as Senator O'GORMAN contends in the earlier and basic part of his argument, to "international trade." By the Constitution of the United States Congress has power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes."

"Commerce," said Chief Justice Marshall (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1, 189), "describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse."

In another celebrated case (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 446) the same great magistrate, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, and referring to the constitutional grant, said:

"It is not, therefore, matter of surprise that the grant should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States."

So the Senator's attempt to limit the meaning of "commerce" to international trade is blocked by the Constitution itself and its greatest expounder.

Nor does the distinguished Senator from New York seem to be any less astray when he says:

"Under international law the word 'vessel' when used in a treaty, unless the contrary meaning is clearly apparent, refers only to vessels engaged in international or over-seas trade. It does not relate to vessels engaged in local or domestic trade."

An examination of the treaties between the United States and other countries in which the word "vessels" is used seems to demonstrate that there is no such rule or principle of "international law" as the learned Senator asserts. If he were right, what need would there be to insert in so many of our treaties in which the word "vessels" is used, an express provision that the coastwise trade is excepted? Take, for example, our treaty of 1829 with Austria, which repeatedly mentions "vessels of the United States," and "Austrian vessels," but which provides in article 7:

TREATY PROVES ARGUMENT.

"It is expressly understood and agreed that the coastwise navigation of both the contracting parties is altogether excepted from the operation of this treaty and of every article thereof."

This express exception occurs in more than a score of our treaties regarding the rights and privileges of "vessels of the United States," and of the other high contracting parties.

Treaties for the protection of vessels from pirates include all kinds of vessels—fishing vessels and traders, whether over-seas or coastwise. So with statutes. Could it be said, with any show of reason, that coastwise vessels, because not expressly mentioned, were not included in the act of Congress of March 3, 1819, to protect the "commerce of the United States," or that they were not among the "merchant vessels of the United States," which, with their crews, were to be protected, under that act, from piratical aggressions and depredations?

It is in connection with the case of Olsen v. Smith that Senator O'GORMAN contends that, under international law, the word "vessels," when used in a treaty, unless the contrary meaning is clearly apparent, refers only to vessels engaged in international or over-seas trade; but it seems clear that it was on no such principle, but rather on the ordinary rules applicable to the construction of treaties, that the case was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

BRITON CLAIMED EXEMPTION.

In Olsen v. Smith the question was whether a British vessel in the foreign trade was not entitled, at the port of Galveston, to the benefits of a State statute and of the Revised Statutes of the United States, exempting coastwise steamships of Texas and the United States from certain regulations in regard to pilotage, by virtue of the treaty of 1815 between the United States and Great Britain, which provides that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." It clearly appears, from the treaty of 1815, that it was dealing exclusively with British and United States vessels in the foreign trade, and the case was not decided on the ground that the word "vessels" was not comprehensive enough to include vessels in the coastwise trade, or that there was such a rule of international law as that asserted by Senator O'GORMAN, but because it appeared from the treaty itself that, as aforesaid, it was dealing only with vessels of the two countries in the foreign trade. Both countries at that time reserved their coastwise trade for their own vessels, respectively, and the treaty provides expressly, in opening the East India ports to United States vessels, that the permission granted for that purpose, in article 3, is "not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any part of the coasting trade of the said British territories," and that their "going with their original cargoes, or part thereof, from one of the said principal settlements to another shall not be considered as carrying on the coasting trade."

INTENTION MUST GOVERN.

It was doubtless because of this clearly expressed intention to confine the reciprocal benefits of the treaty of 1815 to vessels in the foreign trade, and not because the word "vessels" necessarily excluded coastwise vessels, as contended by Senator O'GORMAN, that the Supreme Court decided as it did.

In treaties, as in other contracts, the intention must govern, and the intention is to be discovered from the treaty as a whole.

The Supreme Court pointed out in Olsen v. Smith that no discrimination had been made by the authorities in Texas between British and United States vessels in the foreign trade, the only classes of vessels with which the treaty of 1815 is concerned. And it seems to have been with reference to that treaty for the reciprocal treatment of vessels of the same class, which had been set up in the case, that the court said, by Chief Justice White:

"Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade."

So in the Texas Court of Civil Appeals below Chief Justice James observed:

"The exemption has not been extended to American ships engaged in foreign commerce, and until this is done British vessels of the same character are equally subject to our statute."

While the treaty of 1815 shows clearly that the negotiators had the two kinds of trade and the two classes of vessels in mind, and did not intend to include the coastwise shipping of either country in the phrases "vessels of the United States" or "vessels of Great Britain," there is nothing whatever in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to suggest that the idea of exempting the coastwise shipping of the United States from the payment of tolls had ever been in the minds of the negotiators, the only mention of merchant vessels in the treaty being in the covenant that the canal shall be free and open to "the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality." If any exception had been intended, it would have been the easiest and most proper thing to have inserted after the words "on terms of entire equality" in the treaty the words "excepting only such vessels as shall be engaged exclusively and bona fide in the coastwise trade of the United States." This would have been in accordance with the express exceptions of the coastwise trade written into more than a score of our treaties in regard to shipping with other nations, as hereinbefore stated.

Not only is there no mention or suggestion of coastwise trade or coastwise vessels distinctively in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty now in force, but, as has been said so often, when a motion was made in the debate on the earlier Hay-Pauncefote treaty in executive session of the Senate to amend the treaty by reserving the right to exempt the coastwise shipping of the United States from the payment of tolls, it was voted down by a large majority.

WOULD BAR OUT OTHERS.

If the term "vessels of commerce" used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not include vessels in the coastwise trade, as contended by Senator O'GORMAN, then a British vessel desiring to coast south from Halifax to Colon and north from Panama to Vancouver would have no right to go through the canal, because only "vessels of commerce and war" are mentioned in the treaty, and the words "vessels of commerce" according to Senator O'GORMAN, mean only vessels "engaged in international trade." "The treaty," says the Senator, "speaks of 'vessels of commerce and of war.' The two classes of vessels referred to," he continues, "would necessarily exclude vessels that are neither vessels of commerce nor vessels of war. And for the reasons indicated the treaty excludes vessels in the coastwise or domestic trade. They are not vessels of commerce within the authorities cited."

This, then, is where the argument of the Senator leads him—vessels in the coastwise or domestic trade of the United States can pass through the canal free, under the act of Congress, without contravening the treaty, but vessels in the coastwise or domestic trade of Great Britain are excluded from the canal by the treaty itself, as interpreted by the Senator. This would certainly be "discrimination" with a vengeance.

The Senator's argument leaves it clearer, if possible, than it was before that "vessels of commerce," as used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, must include vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, and that if it had been the intention of the negotiators to exclude them from the provisions of the treaty, they would have expressly excepted them, in accordance with the precedent established by the numerous treaties in which the exception of the coastwise trade, made in article 6 of the treaty with Austria, is followed.

Other criticisms of the Senator's argument could be made, but it only needs to be added here that, like all who oppose the repeal of the exemption, Senator O'GORMAN ignores the position maintained before the world by the United States in regard to neutralization and equal terms for the Isthmian Canal for nearly a century. Her official utterances have been collated elsewhere. Only three of them will be mentioned here.

EARLIER DICTUMS CONCLUSIVE.

Under instructions from Mr. Clayton, Secretary of State in 1850, Mr. Rives assured Lord Palmerston that the United States "sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication," but desired "to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all."

Gen. Cass, Secretary of State in 1857, said to Lord Napier, when the controversy in regard to the true meaning and intent of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was at its height:

"The United States, as I have before had occasion to assure your lordship, demand no exclusive privileges in these passages, but will always exert their influence to secure their free and unrestricted benefits, both in peace and war, to the commerce of the world."

"Nor in time of peace," said Mr. Blaine, while Secretary of State, in 1881, "does the United States seek to have any exclusive privileges accorded to American ships in respect to precedence or tolls through an interoceanic canal any more than it has sought like privileges for American goods in transit over the Panaman Railway under the exclusive control of an American corporation."

In repealing the exemption the United States would simply be keeping her plighted faith, not at the behest of England, but of her own conscience and for her own sake.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I wish to state that on Friday next, after the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate, with its permission, on the subject of the Panama Canal tolls.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to announce that on Monday next, May 25, after the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate upon the Panama Canal question.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 15762. An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

TRANSPORTATION OF PARCEL-POST MATTER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 363, by Mr. SMITH of Georgia, requesting the Joint Committee on Postage on Second-Class Mail Matter and Compensation of Transportation of Mails to report.

Mr. SMOOT. In the absence of the Senator from Georgia I suggest that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over without prejudice.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Panama Canal tolls bill be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, when the Panama Canal act was before the Senate two years ago I supported the provision exempting the coastwise shipping of the United States from the payment of tolls. In so doing I was influenced, as I think the Senate was influenced, not so much by a consideration of the economic policy of the exemption considered by itself as I was by the far more important question as to the right of the American Government to deal in its own way with American shipping passing through the canal unhampered by treaty stipulations. My vote was intended to be an assertion of my confident belief in the existence of that right far more than it was of my belief in the wisdom of the precise manner in which the right was then specifically exercised.

The economic wisdom of exempting our ships engaged in the coastwise trade is by no means free from doubt. Much can be said upon either side of that proposition. If it were possible to vote upon that question dissociated from the graver question of our rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty I should feel the necessity of investigating the subject more thoroughly than I have thus far done, but as the matter is now presented I shall vote against the repeal of the exemption clause, basing my vote primarily upon what I conceive to be the necessity of reasserting with emphasis the American right under the treaty, and leaving myself free to consider the economic side of the subject when, if ever, it may be determined solely upon its merits apart from the protest to which we are forced to respond and which directly challenges our right to determine it at all.

To vote for the repeal now, as I interpret the situation, would be to concede in the most deliberate manner our want of legitimate power to allow the exemption, however wise or necessary we may conceive such action to be. Unless we are simply trifling with the subject, the action of Congress upon this bill will announce the permanent view of Congress respecting the extent of its powers under the treaty and not its temporary view respecting the specific way in which those powers should be exercised. It is true that the President declares in his message that the exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy, but his appeal for a reversal of our former action is based upon the assertion that whatever we may think of the matter "everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption." And he tells us that "we ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation." Let us not beguile ourselves. It is to this appeal and no other that we must respond. To repeal the exemption while asserting the right to grant it is simply to dodge the issue.

According to the President's view our former action is regarded everywhere outside the United States as a breach of our national word. If this be true, a reversal of our former action must be regarded everywhere as an acknowledgment of our wrongdoing and as a deliberate and well-considered admission that our construction of the treaty was erroneous, and the construction of those "everywhere else" is right. It is therefore idle to pretend that if the pending bill be passed we can ever again with decency enact an exemption law. We should deal with the question without equivocation. The challenge of the world, the justness of which the President asks us to concede, is not against the economic wisdom of the action which we have taken, but it is against our righteous authority to take the action at all. This challenge should be met with that high candor which befits a great people intelligent enough to determine for themselves what are their rights and what are their obligations and courageous enough to vigorously assert the former and just enough to ungrudgingly perform the latter.

If this bill shall be enacted into law, whatever we may think about it—to borrow the felicitous phrase of the President—"everywhere else" our action will be given but one interpretation and that will be that it constitutes an admission of the accuracy of the President's claim that our former action was in violation of the treaty, because "everywhere else" they will regard only what the President has said and what we have done. To repeal the exemption now and reimpose it at some more auspicious time hereafter will be to stand convicted in the eyes of the world of having engaged in a piece of rather disreputable sharp practice and expose us to that contempt which is always the penalty for shiftiness and evasion.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], shrewdly suspecting a political pitfall in the pathway selected by the President, has presented to his colleagues a series of skillfully drawn plans and specifications for reaching the same point by a less dangerous route; but he deceives nobody, not even himelf. He speaks as one who leads a company of bold and adventurous spirits in an attack upon the twin monsters of monopoly and subsidy; but everybody understands that, in fact, he follows the President in an inglorious abandonment of an American right.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], also apprehensive and likewise resourceful, has proposed a little amendment, by which—to slightly alter the figure of speech—that sagacious and skillful pilot would steer the Democratic bark along the crooked channel of political expediency so as to escape the Scylla of capitulation to Great Britain on the one hand and the Charybdis of repudiation of the White House upon the other.

What is the amendment which the distinguished Senator from North Carolina proposes? It is, in substance, that nothing in this act—which, of course, repudiates the American and accepts the foreign interpretation of the treaty, else it would not be "in support of the foreign policy of the administration"—is to be "considered or held as waiving, impairing, or affecting any treaty or other right possessed by the United States." And this proviso the Senator offers with the simple and pathetic faith of a child who surrenders its toys to a friend, relying upon a resolution of thanks for its future amusement. The Senator from North Carolina is a serious-minded man, with slight leanings in the direction of any form of frivolity—wholly without guile or "purpose of evasion"—and therefore may not lightly be charged with a desire to perpetrate a confidence game on the trusting gentleman who occupies the White House or readily be suspected of presuming overmuch on the traditional obtuseness of the British mind in the presence of an American joke; but, sir, when we repeal a law for the express purpose of confessing that we had no right to pass it, the attachment of a string in the form of a declaration that in so doing we have no intention of surrendering any right seems so inconsequential that I am quite unable to see how even the austere reputation of the Senator from North Carolina can save us from the suspicion that we are indulging in a little legislative badinage for the mere sake of the intellectual exercise.

When the lady of Byron's creative genius, "Whispering, 'I will ne'er consent'—consented," she proceeded under no self-delusions. She understood her own lack of fortitude in the presence of temptation. She exhibited a certain degree of verbal reluctance—definite in form but deceptive in substance—for the sake of appearances, but there seems to have been no doubt in the mind of the veracious recorder of the incident that her capitulation was complete.

But this later, if no less enchanting, coquette, the Senator from North Carolina, who, while yielding to the presidential blandishments, whispers into the bill an amendment in the nature of an ex post facto proviso to the effect that nothing in the circumstances of his fall shall be construed as impairing, affecting, or waiving any of the virtuous proclivities which he still possesses, seems to be laying the foundation for a plausible but specious contention that he had not yielded at all but simply engaged in a more or less mild and perfectly harmless flirtation "in support of the foreign policy of the administration."

And so, Mr. President, Senators upon the other side of the Chamber may indulge in such sophistry as their ingenuity may suggest, but the President's appeal is definite and can not be met by any oblique approach. He says, it is true—and I repeat it for the sake of emphasis—that the exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, as well as being in plain contravention of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but he immediately adds:

> But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

And in view of this situation he tells Congress what it ought to do.

> The large thing to do—

He says—

> is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation—

Not for economic wisdom, it will be observed, but—> for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

And then to clinch the matter and put it beyond the peradventure of a doubt he says:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration.

We are to pass this bill, then, in support of the foreign policy of the administration, and the President makes it clear that this means we are to accept the English interpretation of the treaty and abandon our own. If the Simmons amendment, therefore, means that we intend to declare that we temporarily accept the English construction for the sake of helping the administration out of some serious though undisclosed foreign complication, intending to reassert our own construction after the diplomatic embarrassment shall have passed, then we ought to say so in plain words and not render ourselves contemptible by adopting a proviso so vague and so disingenuous that it will of necessity arise to plague our successors when they come to deal again with a problem which we lack the candor or the courage to settle decisively now once for all.

Now, mark, we are to do this thing "without raising the question whether we were right or wrong." That is, we are not to consider the evidence; we are not to weigh the arguments pro and con; we are not to use our reasoning faculties for the purpose of arriving at a just determination; we are to abdicate our functions as legislators charged with the responsibility of our action; we are to lay aside our well-considered and settled convictions, if we have any, without raising the question whether we are right or wrong and withdraw from our former position, not because we have made an economic mistake, not in the interest of the American people, but because, and only because, that "position is everywhere questioned and misunderstood." And this is to be done not in pursuance of a sound domestic policy but in support of the foreign policy of the administration. Thus the issue is defined and limited by the presidential petition as clearly and conclusively as an issue was ever limited and defined by a bill in a court of equity, and the Senate is called upon to render judgment upon that issue, and no other.

Mr. President, in the history of free government no such astounding proposition has ever before been presented to a great legislative body as this demand of the President that we shall reverse our action "without raising the question whether we were right or wrong." To comply with it would be so utterly subversive of every consideration of self-respect that even those who intend to capitulate will raise the question and make a pretense of justifying their action upon defensible grounds before acceding to the President's request.

I had supposed that outside of England there was very little feeling on the subject. Certain it is that no other country has concurred with the English protest in any formal way. If there be any real sentiment in favor of the British view, these other countries have exhibited no anxiety to make it known. But the President in effect tells us that "everywhere else" outside the United States the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation harmonizes with that of Great Britain.

Sir, I do not undervalue the opinions of the world outside our own borders. We should, of course, give heed to the views of Great Britain and of the other Governments, if any there be, who share them. These opinions are not to be ignored. Neither are they to be obsequiously followed. In the final analysis the question is not whether our position meets with the dissent or the approval of the world, but whether the opinions which the President thinks prevail in those undefined and comprehensive but hitherto unsuspected regions, extravagantly described as "everywhere else," are right. "A decent regard to the opinions of mankind," of which we have heard so much from time to time during this discussion, does not mean a blind and fatuous surrender of our own convictions. It only demands that these opinions should be considered and weighed in a mood neither truckling nor truculent, but in that serious and open-minded spirit which seeks to know the truth with the courageous determination to declare it without regard to the character of its reception.

I imagine the author of the Declaration of Independence, if he were now in the flesh, would look with some degree of astonishment upon the present attempt to utilize his immortal phrase as a justification for surrendering an American right to a foreign opinion. Certainly, as it appears in that historic document, it admits of no such construction. It was used in a far braver and sturdier sense. If we will take the trouble to refresh our memories, we shall find that what the fathers thought "a decent regard to the opinions of mankind" required them to do was simply to "declare the causes which impel them to the separation" from Great Britain. But the evidence was weighed by the fathers alone and the sufficiency of the causes was determined by them without reference to what might be thought about the matter "everywhere else." The separation was declared as an accomplished fact and not as a tentative proposition submitted for outside consideration. It was to go forward, and did go forward, wholly without regard to the opinions of mankind as to the justice or soundness of the causes. In deference to the opinions of mankind the fathers went no further than to announce what they had done and to lay before the world the reasons for their action, but the action itself was final—the American view was unchangeable, whether the world approved or not.

And so, Mr. President, I am brought to the consideration of the real question which the Senate is called upon to decide, and that is whether we have the right to exempt our coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls and not whether such exemption is wise from the purely domestic point of view. The correct determination of this question requires the careful consideration of two treaties, namely, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 19, 1850, and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November 18, 1901.

Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it was agreed by the United States and Great Britain substantially as follows: (1) That neither of the parties would ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over a certain ship canal then in contemplation between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans through Nicaragua; (2) that neither of the parties would maintain any fortifications commanding the canal or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over any part of Central America; (3) that neither would acquire rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation which should not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other; (4) that both parties should protect the canal during its construction and after its completion, and should guarantee the neutrality thereof so that it should forever be open and free, and the capital invested secure; (5) that they would use their influence with governments possessing territory which the canal should traverse to induce them to facilitate the construction of the canal and to procure free ports at each end thereof; (6) that the parties should invite other States to enter into similar stipulations to the end that these other States might share in the honor and advantage of having contributed to the building of the canal; (7) that the parties were to give their support and encouragement to those first offering to commence the canal with the necessary capital; and, finally, by article 8 it was agreed as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

It will be seen that this treaty, so far as its substantive provisions are concerned, dealt with a specific canal and that it was clearly stipulated: (a) That the canal should be protected by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain not only during its construction but afterwards in its operation; (b) that other nations were to be invited to join in this protection; and (c) that the canal should be open to Great Britain and the United States and other Governments willing to grant such protection upon equal terms. This treaty contemplated the construction of a canal, not by the signatory Governments or either of them or by any Government, but by private parties, and it constituted in effect a contract between two parties by which each was to share equally in the burdens and equally in the benefits, and other Governments were to share equally in these benefits only upon the condition that they assumed an equal share of the burdens.

It will be observed, furthermore, that the effective provisions of the treaty not only relate exclusively to a particular canal but the self-denying agreement as to fortifications, colonization, and dominion applies only to Central America and does not include the Isthmus of Panama, across which our canal has been constructed. The only reference to the Isthmus is contained in article 8, and that contains not a present agreement but a stipulation for a future agreement by which the protection of the high contracting parties will be extended to any other practical communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America. The Isthmus, of course, does not and never did form any part of Central America. It was formerly included in New Granada and afterwards constituted one of the States of Colombia, a South American Republic. I can not understand upon what theory it can be successfully claimed that the United States was precluded by any provision of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty from constructing and exclusively operating in any manner it saw fit a canal across the Isthmus. The provisions of this treaty with reference to joint protection, equality of benefit, and inhibition against the assumption or exercise of dominion by either of the contracting parties apply by precise and specific terms to Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, and any part of Central America, and nowhere else. The Isthmus was deliberately left to be dealt with in the future, the only agreement being, not that the parties do presently extend, but that they will thereafter extend their protection by treaty stipulation—that is, by subsequent agreement—to any canal or railway across the Isthmus.

It is axiomatic that a promise in general terms to make an agreement can not be enforced, and this is obvious from the very nature of the matter, since an agreement to make an agreement necessarily presupposes that the minds of the parties have not yet met upon the terms, else there would have been an agreement and not a mere engagement to agree. Such an arrangement between private parties could not be specifically enforced by a court of equity, nor could damages for a breach be awarded by a court of law, since neither court could possibly know what the final agreement of the parties would be, and no judge could make an agreement for them. Either party to such an understanding may effectually prevent its being made operative by insisting upon conditions which the opposite party is unwilling to accept

The view of the matter which I have just stated seems to have been that in the mind of Mr. Hay. I find that in the statement which was prepared by him and sent to Senator Cullom, at that time and for a long time thereafter chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, speaking of a clause which had been suggested by Great Britain, he says:

The clause so proposed was regarded by the President as more far-reaching than the purpose demanded and as converting the vague and indefinite provisions of the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—which only contemplated future treaty stipulations to be entered into when any other route should prove to be practicable—into a very definite and certain present treaty which would fasten the crystallized rules of this treaty upon every other interoceanic communication across the Isthmus; and as perpetuating in a much stricter and more definite and more extended form, by a revision and reenactment of the eighth article, the mischievous effects of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, of which it was the desire and hope of the United States to be relieved altogether.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did Secretary Hay use the word "reenactment" there?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; "by a revision and reenactment of the eighth article"; that is, it was Secretary Hay's view that the amendment proposed by the British Government would have resulted in that; but that amendment was not accepted by our Government.

In this connection it is worthy of note that many years ago a railroad was constructed across the Isthmus, which afterwards came into the ownership of the United States, and, although this railroad has been thus operated for many years, it does not appear that Great Britain has ever sought a compliance on the part of the United States with the provisions of article 8, although these provisions apply quite as clearly to a railway as they do to a canal—an apparent recognition of the unenforceability of the agreement to agree or a virtual abandonment of it.

So far as I know, there never has been a suggestion from Great Britain or from anywhere else that the treaty stipulations referred to in the eighth article should be entered into with reference to the Panama Railway.

As it seems to me, therefore, if the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been left in force and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty had never been adopted, the United States would have been within its rights in acquiring the practical ownership of the canal strip, building the canal across it, and exclusively controlling and operating it upon such terms as it saw fit to impose. I can not escape the conclusion that as the matter has finally turned out the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, instead of removing an obstruction and clarifying the situation, in reality had the effect of complicating the situation, which otherwise would have been perfectly clear. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was, however, adopted, and we must submit to its terms, however unwise or oppressive they may turn out to be.

Let me pause long enough at this point to indulge in an observation of a more or less speculative character. Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty there is no doubt that Great Britain and the United States would have been entitled inter se to the use of any canal which might have been constructed upon exactly identical terms. They had each contributed in identical proportions to the burden which they had jointly assumed. It was therefore natural that each should share to the same extent in the resulting benefits. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, however, was superseded, and a new treaty was adopted, under which the United States took upon itself the entire burden, and Great Britain was relieved for all time to come of every vestige of it. Moreover, at least so far as the Isthmus of Panama and the canal across it, which has finally been constructed, were concerned, Great Britain in consenting to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty yielded up no substantial right whatsoever, for, as I have already shown, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not relate to the Isthmus, except by a nebulous and unenforceable tentative agreement looking to some future arrangement.

In this state of affairs, Great Britain having been relieved from her share of the burden which the United States assumed, we should naturally expect that Great Britain would cease to be entitled to an equal and identical participation in the benefits, since such participation would be obviously inequitable. It would certainly be an example of unusual and extravagant generosity under these circumstances for the Government of the United States to have consented not only to take over all the burdens of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but to spend $400,000,000, taken from the pockets of its taxpayers, upon a more or less doubtful enterprise with the understanding that it and its citizens should never participate in the beneficial use of the canal to a greater extent than Governments and citizens of Governments that had never spent a dollar and were burdened with not the slightest care or responsibility respecting the enterprise. And yet, reduced to its naked simplicity, this is the precise proposition which the proponents of the British construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty must establish. I submit that under every rule of interpretation recognized by lawyer or layman, such a view of the matter ought never to be sustained except upon language so clear and unambiguous as to irresistibly exclude any other just conclusion.

With this observation, let us examine the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and, first of all, it will be observed that by the very first article of that treaty the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is unconditionally abrogated. Article 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty unconditionally provides—

> The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

Thus the Clayton-Bulwer treaty entirely disappears, save in so far as and only to the extent that any of its provisions may have been carried by repetition into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In other words, the question now at issue is to be determined by the provisions which are to be found within the four corners of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty alone.

There is no suggestion in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty looking to the perpetuation of any part of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty beyond a mere recital, contained in the preamble, of an intention not to impair the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8. Of course the mere preliminary recital of an intention to accomplish a given result does not accomplish it; an intention to agree is not an agreement. We must look to the substantive part of the treaty and not to its preamble to determine what binding obligations the parties have entered into. The recital may be used to reflect light upon the meaning of the agreement wherever that meaning is in doubt, but it can not be used to supply a clear omission nor to attach to these obligations a meaning of which they are clearly not susceptible.

Precisely what was meant by the expression "general principle of neutralization established in article 8" it is difficult to determine, since a careful reading of that article fails to disclose a single provision which can be described by the term "neutralization" as that term is ordinarily understood. The terms "neutral," "neutrality," and "neutralization" in their ordinarily accepted sense apply only to a condition of war. The obligations of neutrality are negative in character. If a State is neutral, it is simply bound not to assist either of the belligerents. If territory is neutralized, it can not be utilized by either of the belligerents to carry on its military operations. By article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the United States and Great Britain agree that, at some indefinite time in the future, they will make another treaty by which they will extend their protection to any other canal or railway, and declare that in granting such protection the parties shall receive equal treatment from the owners of the canal or railway. The article, therefore, contemplates some form of joint protection as a substantive obligation, and equal treatment as a consequential result, neither of which, under any known definition of that term, means neutralization. That precise term in this connection appears for the first time in the preamble to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which I have already referred to.

When we come to article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we discover that, whatever was meant by "neutralization," it is something entirely different from any of the stipulations contained in article 8. Under the first draft of this treaty, which was submitted to the Senate in 1900, the provision was that "the high contracting parties * * * adopt as the basis of neutralization the following rules," which are then set forth. Under the treaty as finally adopted, the provision is not that the high contracting parties, but that the United States alone adopts as the basis of neutralization the rules. This change is not formal, but substantial. It at once takes from Great Britain her contractual relationship to the canal, and puts her in the position, so far as the rules are concerned, of a stranger to it. The United States then, as the owner and controller of the canal, adopts the rules under which the canal is to be used.

I have already said, but I repeat, for the point can not be overemphasized, that by the abrogation of the old treaty and the adoption of the new the requirement for joint protection and the joint responsibility for the neutralization entirely disappeared. That burden and responsibility, as well as every other burden and responsibility, was lifted from the shoulders of Great Britain and imposed exclusively upon the United States. To the mind trained to the consideration of legal principles it will at once occur that the obligation to protect and to guarantee neutrality, which constituted the consideration for the continuing right to receive equal treatment, having ended, the right would end also, for it is fundamental that a failure of consideration for a continuing obligation ipso facto puts an end to the obligation. And, moreover, it would seem that, inasmuch as article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty at the most recognized the right of Great Britain and other nations to use the canal on equal terms with the United States in consideration of their obligation to furnish joint protection, that when this obligation terminated the right to equality of treatment went with it as a necessary consequence, and this, I take it, would be universally conceded were it not for the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which I shall now proceed to examine.

The introductory clause of article 3 is as follows:

> The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

The first paragraph following this introductory clause reads as follows:

> 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It must at once strike the critical mind that this paragraph has not the slightest thing to do with neutralization. It simply provides for equality of treatment of all nations which observe the rules. The introductory clause is that the United States adopts as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal the following rules. Paragraphs 2 to 6, inclusive, embody provisions applicable to a condition of neutralization. They are substantially as follows:

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor any right of war exercised or act of hostility committed within it. The United States, however, may maintain military police along the canal to protect it.

3. Vessels of war of the belligerents are not to revictual or take stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary. The transit of vessels through the canal is to be effected with the least possible delay.

4. No belligerent may embark or disembark troops or munitions or materials of war in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit to be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article are to apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent may not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours, etc.

6. The plants, buildings, etc., necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal are to be deemed part of it for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents.

It is evident, therefore, that the first paragraph is not one of the rules contemplated by the introductory clause. That paragraph constitutes not one of the rules, but simply the formal tender of the use of its canal which the United States makes to every nation which shall observe the rules which are set forth in the succeeding paragraphs. This is manifest upon an analysis of the language. The canal is to be open to the vessels of all nations observing the rules, namely, the rules adopted as the basis of neutralization, upon equal terms, so that no such nation shall be discriminated against. As a tender of the use of the canal upon certain conditions this is understandable. Regarded as a rule to be observed by those invited to use the canal, it is meaningless. It is a provision incapable of observation by anybody except the United States. It is not set forth as a rule to be observed as a condition precedent to the use of the canal, but it is a declaration of the purpose of the United States to allow the canal to be used upon equal terms by all nations who obey the rules adopted by the United States, which are then set forth in detail. Moreover, that this is not one of the rules adopted by the United States as the basis of the neutralization of the canal is made manifest by the clause which immediately follows, namely, that the rules so adopted are "substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople." An examination of the convention of Constantinople will disclose that paragraphs 2 to 6, inclusive, of article 3, are there substantially embodied, while nothing in the nature of paragraph 1 is to be found in that convention.

I know it has been asserted here several times that there was a provision in the convention of Constantinople for equal tolls. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], a very careful student, made that same statement in his address the other day. And yet the convention of Constantinople will be searched in vain to find any such provision. In the preamble to that convention there is a recital that these various signatory powers, "wishing to establish by a conventional act a definite system destined to guarantee at all times and for all the powers the free use of the Suez Maritime Canal, and thus to complete the system," and so forth, and article 1, which is the only article which directly bears on the subject, is as follows:

The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to every vessel of commerce or of war, without distinction of flag.

So the provision of that convention is for the free use of the canal; that it shall be open to all nations without respect to flag; but there is no provision whatsoever looking to equal tolls or equal charges. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty recites that "as the basis of such neutralization the following rules" are to be "substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople," and it is significant that when we examine that convention we find that rules 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 are substantially embodied, but paragraph 1 finds no counterpart in the Suez convention at all.

Let us look at paragraph 1 again, from another angle. The canal is to be open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules. The proponents of the repeal bill necessarily take the position that the United States itself is included within the term "all nations," from which it must logically follow that the United States, although the owner and in sole possession of the canal, may use it only upon condition that it observes its own rules, a doctrine which, if not incomprehensible, is, to say the least, unique.

If the owner of a picture gallery were to enter into a written stipulation with another individual in which he should, among other things, declare that for the protection of his property he adopts the following rules: First, that all persons observing the rules should be entitled to visit the gallery and view the pictures upon equal terms; second, that no person should be admitted except between the hours of 10 in the morning and 6 in the afternoon; third, that the pictures should not be handled, and so on—I suppose no one would insist that the first paragraph, which provides for the observance of the rules as a condition upon which visitors may be admitted to the gallery, itself constitutes one of the rules to be observed by the visitors; and I suppose, moreover, that no one would insist that the owner who made the rules would be included in the term "all persons," and therefore bound to observe the rules in order to inspect his own pictures, or that if he fixed an entrance fee of 50 cents he would be bound to pay this to himself or stay out of the gallery.

It is conceded by the proponents of this bill that the rules contained in paragraphs 2 to 6, inclusive, are not such as the United States is bound to observe as a condition to its own use of the canal upon equal terms with other nations, and this is obvious when we consider their nature, but if the words "all nations" include the United States, it technically and logically follows that if the language be strictly followed the United States must itself observe the rules or bar itself from the canal. The conclusion is, of course, so practically absurd that the mind at once rejects it, but the fact that this conclusion, as a matter of dry logic, does inevitably follow from the premise that the expression "all nations" includes the United States is persuasive, if not demonstrative, that the claim with regard to the comprehensive character of the term "all nations" is fallacious.

If, on the other hand, paragraph 1, as well as the succeeding paragraphs, are all to be treated technically as rules, and the United States, as the owner and controller of the canal, is not bound to observe the last five, by what principle of construction is it bound by the provisions of the first? How can the provision that "all nations" observing these rules—not one of the rules, but all of them—be so arbitrarily dismembered as to mean all nations, including the United States, as to the first rule, and all nations, excluding the United States, as to the other five? A position which results in such manifest inconsistency surely can not be accepted without question. The United States adopts the rules, and agrees that all nations observing them shall have the right to use the canal upon terms of equality. Who is to determine whether any given nation is observing the rules, so as to be entitled to this right? Obviously the United States. But if the United States is included within the term "all nations" it must observe its own rules in order to be allowed to use its own canal, and so, sir, this is the reductio ad absurdum to which we must finally come; that the United States in some given instance, at some future time, will submit to the United States the question as to whether the United States is observing its own rules, and the United States, having determined that the United States is not doing so, will utilize such force as may be necessary to prevent itself from using its own canal pending the development of a more amenable disposition.

Again, the provision is that the canal is to be open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, and so forth. If this applies to the United States, literally the vessels of commerce and of war are to be treated precisely alike. This absurdity is so manifest that no one insists upon it. It is conceded, I think, by everybody that the United States can not be required to pay tolls for its ships of war. The very word "payment" involves necessarily two parties—one who makes the payment and another who receives it. How can the United States pay itself for the use of its own property by its own ships of war? The question, of course, answers itself. The proposition is as foolish as though applied to the case of an individual. An individual can not pay himself anything. He may go through the idle ceremony of taking a dollar from one pocket and putting it into another pocket, but that does not constitute payment. The dollar remains in the same custody. It has not been subtracted from the possessions of one and added to the possessions of another. And so the advocates of repeal admit, as they must admit, that it was never intended that the United States should pay tolls for its war vessels. They recognize the futility of such a requirement—the logical and physical impossibility of complying with it—but they insist that no such impossibility exists in the case of privately owned American ships of commerce. Let that be granted, since it is true. What then? We have not altered the logical aspect of the matter in the least. The requirement does not apply to war vessels, they say, because of the impossibility of performance. Of course, it is impossible of performance and so manifestly incapable of performance that it must have been apparent to those who framed the language.

The men who framed the provisions of the treaty were skilled in the use of words. They would know that if the phrase "all nations" included the United States in the case of ships of commerce, the same phrase logically must include ships of war as well, because it is used to qualify both indifferently. Are we to convict these men, skilled in the meaning of language, trained in the exact use of words, of the crass stupidity which would be involved in the use of terms which, grammatically and dialectically considered, regulate two subjects in the same way, but which carry two diametrically opposite meanings in their practical application?

I do not, of course, doubt that even if the phrase "all nations" includes the United States, so that we can grant no exclusive favors to American ships of commerce, we are not precluded from exempting our warships from the payment of tolls which are exacted from other nations for their ships of war, although ships of commerce and ships of war are included together under the same identical provision. This would follow from the nature of the relationship of the Government to its own property and which would render any other course a practical impossibility. It is just as impossible legally and physically for a government as it is for an individual to make payment to itself, but what I am insisting upon is that what is so clear to us must have been equally clear to those who wrote the treaty. Hence, if they understood that they were making provision whereby the United States would be precluded from granting exclusive privileges to American ships of commerce they must have understood that by the same provision they were in terms prohibiting the United States from granting similar privileges to its ships of war, and thus ostensibly requiring an impossible thing to be done.

A performance so manifestly stupid is inconceivable, and yet if the words "all nations" were intended by those who used them to include the United States, its ships of commerce and its ships of war stand, in their theoretical obligations, upon exactly the same footing with one another and both upon the same footing with the ships of commerce and of war of every other nation; but in practical application our ships of commerce must pay while our ships of war must escape payment under precisely the same treaty provision, one class in compliance with the terms of the treaty and the other in violation of the same terms. And this paradoxical situation would result because a number of learned diplomats, after a year or two of negotiation and consideration, found themselves incapable of intelligibly expressing their thoughts about a very simple matter.

The interpretation which results in an absurdity so gross as to convict the makers of this treaty of deliberately writing into it a provision clearly and indisputably impossible of performance surely should be avoided if possible, and it can be avoided only by interpreting the language as applying in identical manner to both classes of ships. In other words, we must assume that it was not intended by any language which appears in the treaty to require the United States to perform an impossible thing—namely, to pay for the passage of its own warships through its own canal—and that inasmuch as no different or other language is used with reference to ships of commerce, logically a similar intention must be assumed in their case as well, and this does no violence to the natural and grammatical sense of the words, but, on the contrary, harmonizes them and renders intelligible what would otherwise be unintelligible.

Let me again advert to the introductory clause of article 3. The language is—

> The United States adopts as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal the following rules—

And so forth.

I have already said that neutralization is a term which in its ordinary acceptation applies only to a condition of war; and when we consider that the rules which follow do in fact relate to this condition, we would unhesitatingly assign to this word its usual meaning were it not for the fact that the preamble to the treaty apparently recognizes it as meaning something else. That preamble is to the effect that the high contracting parties desire to remove any objection arising out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to the construction of the canal "without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention." This obliges us to examine article 8 for the purpose of ascertaining what general principle of neutralization is therein contained, since on the principle that expressio unius est exclusio alterius every principle or provision of article 8 which does not relate to neutralization is to be excluded.

Strictly speaking, there are only two general principles covered by article 8. One is joint protection, and the other is equality of treatment. It requires no argument to show that neither protection nor equality of treatment constitutes neutralization; so that, if we give the word its usual significance, the recital in the preamble respecting the general principle of neutralization becomes nugatory. It is impossible, with due regard to accurate terminology, to describe the condition whereby one nation agrees to furnish to every other nation a particular service or a particular commodity upon equal terms as "neutralization."

But let us attempt to give some meaning to the term, nevertheless. If it was intended to be used not in its international but in some popular or colloquial sense, even then it could imply nothing more than a condition of indifference. And under any construction which we can imagine, the term "neutralization" can only apply to others than the owner of the territory or property which is neutralized. Inasmuch as the provision of article 8 for joint protection had been nullified the only principle which could possibly remain would be that of equal treatment, and if it had been intended that the United States was to accord to the ships of other nations the same treatment which it accorded to its own, the simple thing would have been to have declared an intention not to impair the general principle of equal treatment.

It is significant, in this connection, that the word "neutralization" is not used in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. There was no need of any such expression there, because article 8 contemplated a condition of equality, both as to burdens and benefits among the parties and those to become parties to the arrangement. But under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty one of the parties was to become the owner, or at least the absolute controller, of the canal, and the use of the word "neutralization" to describe the relationship of this owning or controlling nation to the nonowning, noncontrolling nations, while not happy, is not altogether inappropriate. Whatever else it means, its use in this preamble effectually disposes of the contention that it binds the United States to enforce upon itself the same treatment which it exacts from other nations in their use of the canal. Territory or property can not be neutral to the owner or sovereign of the territory or property. It can, from the nature of things, only be neutral as to others. Under the most liberal construction imaginable, neutralization means and can mean nothing more than a particular status with relation to third parties. It can do no more than connote the course of conduct which the owner shall observe toward others—namely, that they shall be treated alike—not his course of conduct toward himself.

We are sometimes told that when the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under consideration an amendment offered by Senator Bard proposing to reserve to the United States the right "to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade" was considered and disagreed to, and it is vigorously insisted that this was equivalent to a declaration that without this amendment no such discrimination could rightfully be made. It has been shown, however, by the statements of many Senators who participated in the discussion and voted at the time, that the amendment was disagreed to not because it was undesirable, but because it was regarded as unnecessary, the position being that the United States would have this right without the amendment. Whether this position was right or wrong, the original draft of the treaty did not pass, and the treaty as it finally was adopted was a different instrument. Under the latter there was an article specifically superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Every provision which in any manner recognized the contractual relationship of Great Britain or any other country to the canal was eliminated. The United States, speaking as the owner, alone adopted the rules for its use. When this final draft was submitted to the Senate it must have been there considered that there was no longer any doubt that the United States would have the power to favor the coastwise traffic of its citizens, because no attempt was made to bring about an amendment similar to that offered by Senator Bard. There were undoubtedly many Senators who strongly desired that the United States should have this right, and they must have considered that the necessity of specifically reserving it had been obviated by the changes made in the final draft or an effort would have been made to secure the right by amendment. When the first treaty was before the Senate the Bard amendment, in spite of the fact that it was then insisted that it was unnecessary, received 27 votes in the Senate, many Senators voting against it who believed in the principle of it but who regarded it as unnecessary. The treaty was sent back remodeled. The British Government sent a draft over to us, which we amended in some particulars. Finally the draft was completed as it eventually was ratified. When that last draft was laid before the Senate it is utterly inconceivable that if it were not clear to the 27 Senators who had voted for the original Bard amendment that the necessity of that amendment had been entirely obviated by the later draft some Senator would not have offered it in the Senate, but no Senator did so.

I am not unmindful of the fact that some of those concerned in the negotiation of this treaty now tell us that it was the understanding that under it the United States should have no right to exempt its privately owned ships of commerce from the payment of tolls if exacted from the citizens of other countries. I do not doubt that these gentlemen think so, and yet the contemporary memoranda and correspondence will be searched in vain for any direct and unequivocal evidence in support of their recollection.

Whatever may have been the opinions of the negotiators of the treaty respecting equality of tolls, it must not be lost sight of that these views were with reference to the first draft, which failed of ratification. Mr. Choate's opinion, the editorial in the Spectator which has been quoted, the suggestions of Mr. White and the others, whatever they may be worth—and personally I think they are of no great value—were all either with direct reference to the original draft of the treaty or with regard to suggested changes in that draft and before the final draft had been completed. It does not appear that any such opinion was expressed as to this final draft, by which the relations of the United States and other nations to the canal were expressed in radically different terms.

That these changes did alter the situation in this regard, I think, is borne out, if not established, by the statement of Lord Lansdowne in his letter of October 23, 1901, in which, after discussing some of the amendments which had been considered, he says:

> His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers, which—

I suppose that means "while"— > it stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal.

The anxiety of Lord Lansdowne seems to have been that Great Britain should occupy a position as advantageous as other powers, not that she should stand upon an equality with the United States.

It is, moreover, somewhat remarkable that if this latter condition of affairs was intended the treaty should not have precisely so provided instead of being drawn in such a way as to apparently mean something else. The framers of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty seem to have had no difficulty in giving clear expression to their intention in this respect. By that treaty it was expressly provided that the contemplated canal "being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford." This is clear, definite, and certain. Under it there can be no doubt that the exemption of American ships from payments exacted from foreign ships would have violated the treaty, and this would have applied to ships of war as well as ships of commerce, for the owner of the canal being a third party, the United States, could have made payment, a thing which it can not now do, since as owner it has combined in itself inseparably the attributes of both payer and payee. When we turn to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, however, we find no such language, the provision there being that the canal shall be "open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules"—that is, the rules adopted by the United States—"on terms of entire equality." If it had been intended that the canal should be open to the ships of all nations on terms of equality with those of the United States it would have been as easy to have said so as it was in the case of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but instead of saying it the framers of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty adopted a form of expression which, unless violence be done to the natural import of the language, must be construed as putting the United States, as owner, in the attitude of tendering to all other nations observing its rules the use of its canal upon equal terms with one another.

This view of the matter, moreover, is to my mind strongly supported by a piece of circumstantial evidence to which I invite the attention of the Senate. Senators will recollect that there were three separate and distinct drafts of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—(1) the draft signed February 5, 1900, amended by the Senate and never ratified; (2) the draft submitted by the English Government on August 3, 1901; and (3) the completed treaty of November 18, 1901. The first draft of the treaty provided that "the canal shall be free and open * * * to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise." The second draft, submitted by the English Government, provided "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation so agreeing, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions or charges of traffic shall be just and equitable." It will be seen that the following clauses were interpolated in the English draft: After the words "all nations" there was inserted "which shall agree to observe these rules," after the words "any nation" was inserted "so agreeing," and at the end of the paragraph "Such conditions or charges of traffic shall be just and equitable." Under the first draft the language was "The high contracting parties * * * adopt as the basis of such neutralization the following rules," and so forth. Under the English draft this was changed to read "The United States adopts as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal the following rules." and so on.

When the English draft was prepared it is perfectly apparent that the draftsman understood that the United States stood, upon the one side, as the owner and controller of the canal proposing certain rules for its use, and that all nations except the United States stood upon the other side as nonowners entitled to use the canal upon equal terms inter se, upon the condition that they agree to observe the owner's rules. That this was the understanding of the draftsman is made clear by his use, after the words "free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations," of the expression "which shall agree to observe these rules," and, after the words "so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation," of the expression "so agreeing," since a provision for an agreement conclusively implies two parties. One party can not agree with himself. The canal was to be open to the vessels of all nations which shall agree to observe the rules. With whom were they to agree? Obviously with that party which, as the owner of the canal, had adopted the rules. But if the United States is embraced within the term "all nations" then we must convict this draftsman of an attempt to provide that the United States must agree with itself to observe its own rules, since the right to use the canal is conditioned upon such an agreement.

It is true that in the final treaty as ratified and proclaimed this expression "which shall agree to observe these rules" was stricken out and there was inserted in its place the words "observing these rules," but this change was made to remove the objection that under the provision for an agreement the other nations would occupy a contractual relationship to the canal; and the change does not at all weaken the significance of the use of the original expression as indicating the understanding that the term "all nations" did not include the United States.

I think that position is strengthened by the further provision in the English draft that "such conditions or charges of traffic shall be just and equitable." That was not in the original draft of the treaty. It seems to be a recognition upon the part of Great Britain that the treaty had been so framed that the United States stood upon one side and all nonowning nations upon the other side; that the United States would be entitled to favor its own shipping if it saw fit; and in view of that circumstance, in view of that change in the treaty, Great Britain insisted that there should be a specific provision in the treaty that "such conditions or charges of traffic shall be just and equitable," because it is hardly to be supposed that if the United States had no power to deal differently with its own shipping it would make charges which must apply to its own shipping which were not just and equitable; but, having a right to discriminate, then England recognizes the wisdom of having some specific provision which will require the United States, in dealing with other nations, to make tolls that will be just and equitable.

Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it will not be doubted that any Government, out of its own treasury, might have paid the tolls upon the ships of its citizens, though if some paid and some did not at once a condition of inequality would result; but it would not have been a violation of the treaty. So it can not be doubted that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty any nation may in the same way pay the tolls for the ships of its citizens. If the United States therefore can not do the same thing, not equality but inequality results. But it seems to be conceded that there is nothing in the treaty which will interfere with the payment of subsidies by the United States to its privately owned ships of commerce, and these subsidies could, of course, be the exact equivalent of the tolls. In other words, the United States is perfectly free, in effect, to reimburse out of its Treasury the owners of American coastwise ships passing through the canal for the amount which they have paid in tolls. It may exact the payment at the entrance and return it at the exit.

We have been told by the courts many times that the law regards the substance and not the form of things. It is insisted that we can not exempt our own ships from the payment of tolls, but it is conceded that we may actually pay them, provided we go through the perfectly idle ceremony of first collecting the amount and then paying it back in the form of a subsidy; and yet if we are forbidden to exempt our coastwise vessels from payment, what is this but an evasion? We may do this not because it does not, in fact, constitute an exemption, for it does, but because it can not be conceived that the United States has yielded up the right—which remains with every other Government—to encourage and build up its merchant marine by the payment of subsidies from the National Treasury. Every nation in the world may pay the tolls for its ships of commerce, and so may we, but only, it seems, by going through the vain proceeding of first compelling payment and then restoring it.

We will all agree that we are forbidden to exempt the ships of Germany, for example, while compelling the ships of England to pay. Suppose we should first collect from German ships and also from English ships, and then provide by law for the payment to the owner of every German ship out of our Treasury of an amount equivalent to the tolls. Is it not clear that there would be in fact a discrimination against English ships, because in that case, looking beyond the matter of form, we should discover that in substance we had exempted German ships and compelled English ships to pay? The conceded fact that we may lawfully adopt that identical course with reference to our own ships without violating the treaty, although in substance it amounts to exempting our own ships and compelling others to pay, constitutes very persuasive evidence that what we can accomplish indirectly by repayment we can legitimately accomplish directly by exemption.

If it were made unlawful for a baker to give away bread to anybody unless he gave it to everybody, surely he would violate the prohibition if he first exacted from everybody the purchase price and immediately returned the amount to some.

But, when learned Senators argue that there is in fact a real and substantial difference between tweedledee and tweedledum,

I am, of course, bound to assume that they, at least, clearly apprehend the difference, however tenuous it may seem to the mind of the practical man; and so when they tell us that it is a shameless breach of our treaty obligations to relieve an American ship from the payment of tolls by the simple and direct method of not collecting it, but that we are preserving the national honor by collecting the amount from the ship as it sails in at one end of the canal and returning it as the ship sails out at the other end of the canal, I must, of course, accept that as an appeal to my reason and not to my sense of humor. Nevertheless, I fancy that if the manager of a railroad, forbidden to grant free transportation to a passenger, should sell him a ticket at the beginning of the journey and return the purchase price to him at the end of the journey, that manager would have some difficulty in convincing a court that he had not come into collision with the statute.

The President tells us that "we ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity * * *." Well, Mr. President, generosity is a very fine and noble attribute, but it occurs to me that if this question is to be determined by an appeal to the canons of generosity it is possible that some other people may well be asked to consider the subject from that point of view. Our people have been taxed to the extent of nearly half a billion dollars to build this canal. In the beginning we could not foresee, nor could anybody foresee, whether the enterprise would be a success or a disastrous failure. We took the risk. We paid forty millions of dollars for the French rights. We paid Panama for the canal strip and have bound ourselves to make an annual payment to that Government of $250,000 for all time to come. If a slide occurs in the Culebra cut we must remove it at whatever cost. If an overflow of the Chagres River in the season of torrential flood shall damage the canal our money must repair it. If, sir, a great earthquake shall some day bring about the utter destruction of the canal the whole stupendous loss must fall upon us. The British treasury will remain intact. Under the most favorable conditions the canal will never be financially profitable. We have opened it upon equal terms to all the nations of the world. We have bound ourselves—and we shall observe the obligation—to make no charges which are not just and equitable. I submit, sir, that whatever may be our other shortcomings, we are not open to the charge of being ungenerous. And yet, after all this, the President of the United States comes to us and appeals to us to deny to the ships of our own taxpayers, engaged in a trade exclusively among our own people, the right to go through our own canal free of charge.

And, after all, it is only nominally free of charge. The benefits of cheaper freight rates, to which this exemption will contribute, will inure to all our people, and it is their money which has built the canal and their money which must maintain it. And so they have already paid, and paid heavily, for the perpetual use of the canal. The man who buys a house does not continue to pay rent, for that would be to pay twice.

The Good Book says, "If any man sue thee at the law and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also," but the President summons us to join him in a surrender of the entire sartorial wardrobe without waiting for the scriptural decree of even partial liability, and this, too, regardless of the fact that the property does not belong to him or to us. We are not dealing, in this case, sir, with our own rights or property. We are here in a representative capacity. The rights which the President calls upon us to surrender in the name of generosity are not his rights or our rights at all, but the rights of the American people, of which he and we are but the temporary guardians. A trustee may be as free as he pleases with his own, but he holds no commission to be generous with that which belongs to his cestui que trust. When we deal with our own we may give with a generous hand; when we deal with the rights of the people we must hold with a jealous hand until they conclude to surrender them.

Mr. President, for the reasons which I have thus so inadequately given, I intend to vote against this bill. I sincerely hope it may be defeated, but I am not one of those who think that such action upon our part should end the matter. Whether we can agree upon anything else, we should at least be able to agree that there are two sides to the question and that those who favor the repeal are not necessarily truckling to Great Britain, any more than those who oppose the repeal are playing fast and loose with the national honor. I have very positive opinions on the subject, but I frankly concede that they may be wrong. Some of the greatest lawyers in this body, as well as in the country, entertain opposing views. The question is fairly debatable. It is therefore a matter which can never be satisfactorily determined until it shall have been decided by an impartial tribunal. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that I should vote to submit it to arbitration.

We have been ratifying arbitration treaties with all the great countries of the world. We have taken a foremost part among the civilized nations in advocating the desirability of settling international disputes by the orderly methods of arbitration rather than by force. We owe it to our own sense of consistency to practice in the present case what for so many years we have so strenuously preached as a general theory. The question itself is one peculiarly and strikingly appropriate for the application of the principle. It comes within the very letter of the arbitration treaties which we have so recently renewed, since it relates to the interpretation of a treaty and does not come within any of the exceptions, for it does not involve our vital interests, or our national honor, or our independence, or the interests of third parties. Obviously it does not affect our independence or the interests of third parties.

To say that the question whether we shall exact the payment of certain sums of money from a class of our citizens or exempt them from payment involves a question of vital interest is to juggle with the plain meaning of words. A vital interest is, as the adjective implies, one which affects the life—financial, political, or otherwise—of the Republic, and obviously this matter does not. To see in such a controversy an assault upon the national honor is to lose all sense of proportion. How can the national honor be affected by an honest dispute about the meaning of a contract? The national honor requires that we should stand for our rights under as well as apart from our treaties, but it does not require that we should doggedly insist upon being the sole interpreter of treaties to which others are parties and which define their rights as well as ours. Does not the national honor demand that we shall keep our treaty engagements, and is not one of the most recent of these engagements that which provides for the arbitration of disputes about the meaning of treaties?

The word of a nation, like the word of an individual, is a very sacred thing, to be kept inviolate at whatsoever sacrifice. To break it in the name of national honor is to be twice dishonored—once when we break it at all, and again when we seek to justify the breach in the name of honor. If this question involves the national honor, it is difficult to imagine any case which would not, and a term which, it must be supposed, was intended to have some definite meaning or it would not have been employed, at once assumes a flexibility so extreme as to become utterly meaningless, no longer constituting a barrier against the shafts of insult and shame, but a convenient, though fallacious, refuge behind which we may retreat whenever we lack confidence in the strength or justice of our contentions.

For myself I can not conceive how it is possible consistently with good faith to decline to submit this controversy to arbitration. To do so will be to repudiate a score of arbitration treaties, most of which we unanimously renewed only a few days ago. It will be to confess that when we agreed to arbitrate differences relating to the interpretation of treaties, we meant only such differences as we might thereafter select. It will be to admit that while we outwardly promised to keep the faith we inwardly resolved to betray. Reserving the right to invoke the national honor as a shield against outrage, we shall interpose it between ourselves and an inconvenience.

I know it is sometimes urged that it will be impossible to secure an impartial tribunal to which this question may be submitted. To insist upon such a claim is itself almost an impeachment of the integrity of all the great lawyers and statesmen of the world. I am sure that we could safely submit this question to the consideration of a tribunal composed exclusively of English judges in secure confidence that a just and righteous determination would be made. I am equally sure that it could be submitted to our own Supreme Court with similar confidence, and I for one would unhesitatingly agree to submit it to a tribunal composed of an equal number of American and English judges.

That we are fully justified in our contention as to the true interpretation of this treaty I have no doubt, and I have no fear of the result of such an arbitration. But whatever the result may be, we should be willing to arbitrate the case or make open confession that our advocacy and our adherence to the principle of international arbitration was a diplomatic pleasantry never intended to be taken seriously.

The difference between repealing this exemption and submitting the dispute to arbitration is radical, for in the one case we unconditionally and weakly surrender "without raising the question whether we were right or wrong," while in the other we assert that we were and are right and not wrong and submit our contentions to the impartial scrutiny of a tribunal upon whose conclusions we have, in the most solemn form, engaged ourselves to rest.

And there, Mr. President, I for one take my stand. Unwilling to admit that we have been wrong where I feel sure we have been right, but recognizing that a judge in his own case, however conscientious, may still err, I will gladly submit our cause to the arbitrament which we have ourselves defined with confident reliance upon a just and righteous determination.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not wish to enter upon a discussion of this question at present. The Senator from Utah has referred, however, to the communication of John Hay to the late Senator Cullom, which was dated the 12th day of December, 1901. It appears on page 53 of Senate Document No. 474, Sixty-third Congress, second session, which was sent here from the State Department in part in response to a resolution which I introduced and in part to a resolution introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate to read the letter from the late Secretary Hay. I will, however, read one paragraph of it, and then ask leave to print it in the RECORD, inasmuch as the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] put two similar matters in the RECORD a few days ago on the other side of the question. I read now from page 60 of the document:

But the President was apprehensive that such a provision would give to the other nations the footing of parties to the contract and give them a contract right to the use of the canal. And in view of the action of the Senate on the former treaty, striking out article 3, which provided for bringing the treaty, when ratified, to the notice of other powers and inviting them to adhere to it, which seemed to mean practically the same thing, he believed that the proposed provision would meet the same fate. This was represented to His Majesty's Government, and it was also insisted on the part of the United States that there was a strong national feeling among the peoples of the United States against giving to foreign powers a contract right to intervene in an affair so peculiarly American as this canal when constructed would be: that, notwithstanding the similar provision in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, no foreign powers in the 50 years that had elapsed had effectively intimated a desire to participate in or contribute to the construction of the canal; that no other power had now any right in the premises, or anything to give up or part with as the consideration for acquiring such a contract right; that they must rely upon the good faith of the United States in its declaration to Great Britain in the treaty that it adopts the rules and principles of neutralization therein set forth, and that it was not quite correct to speak of the nations other than the United States as being bound by the rules of neutralization set forth in the treaty; that it was the United States which bound itself by them as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that the only way in which they were bound by them was that they must comply with them if they would use the canal.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Personal—Not of record—Original not in department files.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 12, 1901.

MY DEAR MR. CULLOM: The treaty with England in respect to the construction of a ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, which the President has sent to the Senate, is the result of careful negotiations conducted between the two Governments since the receipt of Lord Lansdowne's dispatch of the 22d of February last, whereby His Majesty's Government declined to accept, for the reasons therein stated, the former convention of February 5, 1900, as amended by the Senate on the 20th of January, 1901. Under the instructions of the President I have signed on behalf of the United States the treaty now prepared.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, which contemplated the construction of a canal under the joint auspices of the two Governments, to be controlled by them jointly, its neutrality and security to be guaranteed by both, was almost from the date of its ratification the subject of frequent discussion and occasional irritation between the two Governments. Nearly half a century elapsed without any step being taken by either toward carrying it into practical effect by the construction of a canal under its provisions. Instead of being, as was intended, an instrument for facilitating the construction of a canal it became a serious obstacle in the way of such construction. In the meantime the conditions which had existed at the time of its ratification had wholly changed. The commerce of the world had multiplied manyfold. The growth of the United States in population, resources, and ability had been greater still. The occupation and development of its Pacific coast and its commercial necessities upon the Pacific Ocean created a state of things hardly dreamt of at the date of the treaty. At last the acquisition of the Hawaiian and the Philippine Islands rendered the construction of the canal a matter of imperative and absolute necessity to the Government and people of the United States, and a strong national feeling in favor of such construction arose, which grew with the progress of events into an irrevocable determination to accomplish that object at the earliest possible moment.

The incident of one of our great ships of war lying in the North Pacific being ordered to join our fleet in the West Indies in time of actual war, and being obliged for that purpose to round Cape Horn, when through an Isthmian canal she could in much less than half the time have reached the scene of action in which she was destined to take part, was an unanswerable illustration of the urgent and immediate need of such a canal for the protection and safety of the interests of the United States. But the Clayton-Bulwer treaty stood in the way. Great Britain did not manifest, and it is believed did not entertain, the remotest idea of joining or aiding in such a work. The United States was able to bear alone the entire cost of the canal, but was apparently prohibited by the existing treaty from undertaking the enterprise which, although carried out at its own expense, would redound to the benefit of the world's commerce quite as much as to its own advantage. The President, loyal to treaty obligations, was unwilling to countenance any demand, however widespread, for proceeding with the construction of the canal until he could obtain by friendly negotiation, on which he confidently relied, the consent of Great Britain to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, or such a modification of its terms as would enable the United States untrammeled to enter upon the great work whose successful accomplishment was vitally necessary to its own security, and would benefit the people of all other nations according to their respective interests in the commerce of the world.

Such was the situation in which the negotiations for the supersession of the treaty were commenced and have been conducted, and we can not but recognize the fair and friendly spirit in which the successive overtures of the United States toward that end have been met by Great Britain. It has been my firm and constant hope throughout these negotiations that a solution of this difficult and important question between the two Governments would finally be reached which, instead of disturbing the amicable relations which have recently existed and ought always to exist between the United States and Great Britain, would make them more friendly still, and I believe that the treaty now presented, if finally established, will have this desired effect.

It is unnecessary to recall the discussions and negotiations which resulted in the making of the treaty of February 5, 1900, its deliberate consideration by the Senate, the amendments proposed by that body as a condition of its ratification by the United States, and its rejection as so amended by the British cabinet.

In rejecting the amended treaty, in the memorandum of February 22, 1901, Lord Lansdowne gave evidence of the sincere desire of His Majesty's Government to meet the views of the United States and earnestly deprecated any final failure to come to an understanding on this important subject.

Reciprocating these friendly intentions and determined, if possible, to devise a form of treaty which should reconcile the conflicting views which had proved fatal to that of 1900, I prepared and submitted to Lord Pauncefote in March last, for the consideration of his Government, a project for a treaty which, after long and careful consideration and negotiation, has been so perfected as to receive the approval both of the President and of the British Government in the form now presented.

The points on which there was failure to agree in the former treaty consisted of the amendments proposed by the Senate and were three in number:

First. The insertion of the clause relating to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty "superseding" the same;

Second. The addition of the clause providing that the stipulations and conditions of the first five clauses of the third article, as to the neutrality of the canal, should not "apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance ' public order"; and Third. The omission of the invitation to other powers to adhere to the treaty when ratified.

Although on all three of these important points the opposing views of the Senate and of the British Government were most emphatic, I deemed it not impossible that a project might be framed which would satisfy both, without a sacrifice of any essential principle on either side and that the supreme importance of the end in view would justify the attempt.

In the new draft of treaty the clause superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made the subject of a separate article and was submitted to the consideration of the British Government upon terms which would permanently secure the neutrality of the canal for the use of all nations on terms of entire equality and at the same time would relieve Great Britain of all responsibility and obligation to enforce the conditions which, by the former treaty, had been imposed upon or assumed by her jointly with the United States. And to this end instead of the provision that the United States alone adopted them and undertook the whole of that burden.

Second. No longer insisting upon the language of the amendment, which had in terms reserved to the United States express permission to disregard the rules of neutrality prescribed when necessary to secure its own defense—which the Senate had apparently deemed necessary because of the provision in rule 1 that the canal should be free and open "in time of war as in time of peace" to the vessels of all nations—it was considered that the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" would dispense with the necessity of the amendment referred to, and that war between the contracting parties or between the United States and any other power would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties and would remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense and give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent and to protect it by whatever means might be necessary.

Third. While omitting to invite other nations to adhere to the treaty when ratified, and so to acquire contract rights in the canal, it was thought that the provision that the canal should be free and open to all nations on terms of entire equality, now that Great Britain was relieved of all obligation to defend such neutrality, would practically meet the objection which had been made by Lord Lansdowne to the Senate's third amendment, viz, that Great Britain was thereby placed in a worse position than other nations in case of war.

Fourth. In view of the facts that the enormous cost of constructing the canal was to be borne by the United States alone; that when constructed the canal was to be the absolute property of the United States, and to be managed, controlled, and defended by it; and that now by the new project the whole burden of maintaining its neutrality and security was thrown upon the United States, it was deemed fair to omit the prohibition contained in the former treaty forbidding the fortification of the canal and the waters adjacent.

Fifth. The sixth clause of article 3 was retained, which provides that "in time of war as in time of peace" the canal itself shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, in the belief that such a provision was in the general interest of commerce and civilization and that all nations should and would regard such a work as sacred under all circumstances.

With the exception of the changes above enumerated, which were made to reconcile conflicting views, care was taken to preserve in the new draft the exact language which had already passed the Senate without objection, and so far as known without criticism. The draft of the new treaty was transmitted by Lord Pauncefote to Lord Lansdowne, and its treatment by him manifested a most conciliatory spirit and an earnest desire to reach a conclusion which should be satisfactory to the United States, if this could be done without departing from the great principle of neutrality, including the use of the canal by all nations on equal terms, for which Great Britain had always contended.

After months of careful deliberation he announced the readiness of himself and his colleagues to approve the form and substance of the new treaty, with certain amendments hereinafter referred to. He recognized the important bearing upon all the questions involved of the change by which Great Britain was to be relieved of all the burden and responsibility of maintaining the neutrality and security of the canal, which were to be wholly assumed by the United States as the owner of this great work of public improvement built at its own cost. He considered that the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which had been inserted by way of amendment in the former treaty without any previous opportunity for consideration of the matter by Great Britain, would not now be regarded as inadmissible if sufficient provision were made in the new treaty for anything in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which it was any longer of material interest to Great Britain to preserve.

In this connection he referred to the fact that the new treaty contained no stipulation against the acquisition of sovereignty over the territory through which the canal should pass, and that, although the former treaty as approved by Great Britain before its amendment by the Senate had contained no such stipulation, it had left undisturbed that portion of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by which the two Governments agreed that neither would ever occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; and also to article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which is referred to in the preamble of the new treaty and in that of the original treaty of February 5, 1900, as amended by the Senate, as establishing the "general principle" of neutralization, which was not to be thereby impaired.

It was claimed that if Great Britain were now to be called upon to surrender the interests and the principle thus secured by what remained of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, there should be, in view of the character of the treaty now to be concluded and of the "general principle" of neutralization thus reaffirmed in the preamble, some clause inserted agreeing that no change of sovereignty or other change of circumstances in the territory through which the canal is intended to pass shall affect such "general principle" or release the parties, or either of them, from their obligations under this treaty, and that the rules adopted as the basis of neutralization shall govern so far as possible all interoceanic communication across the Isthmus. He therefore proposed, as an additional article, on the acceptance of which His Majesty's Government would probably be prepared to withdraw their objections to the formal abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the following, viz:

"In view of the permanent character of this treaty, whereby the 'general principle' established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare and agree that the rules laid down in the last preceding article shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communication across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and that no change of territorial sovereignty or other change of circumstances shall affect such general principle or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

The clause so proposed was regarded by the President as more far-reaching than the purpose demanded and as converting the vague and indefinite provisions of the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—which only contemplated future treaty stipulations to be entered into when any other route should prove to be practicable—into a very definite and certain present treaty which would fasten the crystallized rules of this treaty upon every other interoceanic communication across the Isthmus; and as perpetuating in a much stricter and more definite and more extended form, by a revision and reanactment of the eighth article, the mischievous effects of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, of which it was the desire and hope of the United States to be relieved altogether.

The President considered that now that a canal between the two oceans was actually about to be built, it was sufficient for the treaty now to be concluded to provide for that alone; that there was hardly a possibility of more than this one canal ever being built between the two oceans—that in that remote and almost impossible contingency the rules and principles governing the use and status of the canal to be constructed under this treaty would be regarded as precedents for the consideration of the parties if they should be approved and sanctioned by experience and by the judgment of the commercial nations; but that for the present a convention for the building of one canal at the cost of the United States for the equal benefit of them all was all that could be wisely attempted. He not only was willing but earnestly desired that the "general principle" of neutralization referred to in the preamble of this treaty and in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be perpetually applied to this canal. This, in fact, had always been insisted upon by the United States. He recognized the entire justice and propriety of the demand of Great Britain that if she was asked to surrender the material interest secured by the first article of that treaty, which might result at some indefinite future time in a change of sovereignty in the territory traversed by the canal, the "general principle" of neutralization as applied to the canal should be absolutely secured, and that a clause should be added to the draft treaty by which the parties should agree that no change of sovereignty or of international relations of the territory traversed by the canal should affect this general principle or the obligations of the parties under this treaty.

These views were in substance submitted to Lord Lansdowne on the part of the United States, and, after considerable discussion and deliberation, the following additional clause, to be known as article 4 of the new treaty, was agreed upon as a substitute for that proposed by him:

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty, or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal, shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

It transpired, in the course of the discussion already referred to, that, although the draft of the new treaty mentioned no particular route which the canal should traverse, there was an apprehension that, as the canal had been so often referred to as the Nicaragua Canal, and the intended treaty as the Nicaragua Canal treaty, it might possibly be claimed that it would not apply to a canal by the Panama route or by any other route, if any such should be selected. But it had always been the purpose of the President that the treaty should apply to the canal which should be first built, by whichever or whatever route, and when this apprehension was communicated to the President he declared such to be his purpose, and, to exclude all doubt, it was agreed that the preamble should be amended by inserting, after the word "oceans," the words "by whatsoever route may be considered expedient."

His Majesty's Government recognized the material importance of the changes from the former treaty as amended by the Senate, by the omission of the Senate amendment that the first five rules of neutrality should not apply to measures which "might be found necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States," and by the omission, as an offset thereto, of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" from rule 1, and of the stipulation prohibiting the erection of fortifications commanding the canal or the waters adjacent. These changes, in the first place, removed what Lord Lansdowne had criticized as a dangerous ambiguity in the former treaty as amended, of which one clause permitted the adoption of defensive measures, while another prohibited the erection of fortifications.

The obvious effect of these changes is to reserve to the United States, when engaged in war, the right and power to protect the canal from all damage and injury at the hands of the enemy, to exclude the ships of such enemy from the use of the canal while the war lasts, and to defend itself in the waters adjacent to the canal, the same as in any other waters, without derogation in other respects from the principles of neutrality established by the treaty; and it was clearly recognized by His Majesty's Government "that contingencies may arise when, not only from a national point of view but on behalf of the commercial interests of the whole world, it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a moment when they were themselves engaged in hostilities."

The omission of the words in the former treaty by which Great Britain was bound jointly with the United States to maintain the neutrality of the canal enabled His Majesty's Government to waive their former objection insisted upon under the former treaty as amended by the Senate, to an agreement which permitted the United States in time of war or apprehended war to interfere with the canal or its use, as its interests might require, while Great Britain alone, in spite of her vast commercial interests, was precluded from taking any measures to secure her interests in or near the canal. By the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace," in the event of the remote and well-nigh impossible contingency of a war between the United States and Great Britain, each party is remitted to its natural right of self-defense, but, even in that emergency, by force of the sixth clause of article 3—which is the only clause in the treaty by its terms expressly applying in time of war as in time of peace—the plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, and shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by the enemy, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

Finally, the absence from the draft treaty of any provision for the adherence of other powers was at first strenuously objected to by the British Government. It protested against being bound by stringent rules of neutral conduct not equally binding upon other powers, and to remedy this proposed the insertion in rule 1, after the word "nations," of the words "which shall agree to observe these rules," so as to make it read that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, who shall agree to observe these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation so agreeing," etc.

But the President was apprehensive that such a provision would give to the other nations the footing of parties to the contract and give them a contract right to the use of the canal. And in view of the action of the Senate on the former treaty, striking out article 3, which provided for bringing the treaty, when ratified, to the notice of other powers and inviting them to adhere to it, which seemed to mean practically the same thing, he believed that the proposed provision would meet the same fate. This was represented to His Majesty's Government, and it was also insisted on the part of the United States that there was a strong national feeling among the peoples of the United States against giving to foreign powers a contract right to intervene in an affair so peculiarly American as this canal when constructed would be; that, notwithstanding the similar provision in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, no foreign powers in the 50 years that had elapsed had effectively intimated a desire to participate in or contribute to the construction of the canal; that no other power had now any right in the premises, or anything to give up or part with as the consideration for acquiring such a contract right; that they must rely upon the good faith of the United States in its declaration to Great Britain in the treaty that it adopts the rules and principles of neutralization therein set forth, and that it was not quite correct to speak of the nations other than the United States as being bound by the rules of neutralization set forth in the treaty; that it was the United States which bound itself by them as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that the only way in which they were bound by them was that they must comply with them if they would use the canal.

It was further insisted that the proposed provision was much more objectionable than the third article of the former treaty, which was struck out by the Senate, for that only invited the other powers to come in and become parties to the contract after ratification. But the proposed provision would rather compel the other powers to come in and agree in the first instance as a condition precedent to any use of the canal by them.

These views were appreciated, and a modification suggested on the part of the United States to Lord Lansdowne's proposed amendment was accepted which omits the words "which shall agree to observe" and substitutes for them the word "observing," and omits the words "so agreeing" and inserts the words "observing," and omits the words "so agreeing" and inserts "such," before "nations," in the next line, so as to make the provision read: "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation," etc. Thus the whole idea of contract right disappears, and any nation whose ships refuse or fail to observe the rules will be deprived of the use of the canal.

The further amendment proposed by Lord Lansdowne, and taken from the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, that the conditions and charges of traffic on the canal shall be just and equitable, was so obviously reasonable that it was accepted by the President as soon as suggested.

I am, etc.,

JOHN HAY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have received a short letter from the State Department explaining how they came into possession of the letter just read, and I ask unanimous consent that I may have a letter addressed to me from Mr. Robert Lansing printed with it, as it explains the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that will be done.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 18, 1914.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR BRANDEGEE: Referring to your oral inquiry at the Department of State this morning, I have the pleasure to say that the copy of the letter from Secretary Hay to Senator Cullom, dated December 12, 1901 (printed in S. Doc. No. 474, 63d Cong., 2d sess.), was made from Secretary Hay's private press-copy book, page 227, which was loaned to this department for the purpose through the courtesy of the late Mrs. Hay. There is on file in the Department of State a record of the manner in which copy of the letter was obtained.

I am, my dear Senator,
Very sincerely, yours, ROBERT LANSING.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, Mr. Hay was the man who drew this treaty. The negotiation for the supercession of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 was begun by him. Mr. Hay directed all the correspondence and instructed our foreign ambassadors about it. It bears his name. He is dead. Ex-Senator Cullom, to whom he wrote this letter, is also dead. But this letter was written while John Hay was Secretary of State, when the existing Hay-Pauncefote treaty was reposing in the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the late Senator Cullom was then chairman, and was notice to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations that the man who negotiated this treaty on behalf of the Government considered that we were bound by these rules. I think that is of considerable significance as being the view taken by the man out of whose brain the whole project emanated, and who was given direct and entire charge of all the negotiations at the time, and who was at that time trying to get the Senate, by way of a favorable report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which Senator Cullom was the chairman, to accept his treaty. It is said in this letter that the rules were intended to be binding upon the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest, as we all have, to the very able argument of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I was especially struck with the point he made in regard to the convention of Constantinople, but it seems to me he overlooked the facts in regard to the tolls of the Suez Canal—that those, of course, were not settled by the convention. Those were settled by the concession to the French company, and of course the convention naturally said nothing about it, because they dealt with the canal as built in the first concession. It provided, after making a sharing of the profits, in article 6:

ART. 6. The tariff of the right of way through the Suez Canal arranged by the company and the Viceroy of Egypt, and levied by the company's agents, always is to be the same for all nations, no one nation being able to stipulate for any advantage to its own profit in particular.

In the second act of concession—I do not remember the date; it is not important—it is provided:

1. The dues to be levied without exception or favor upon all vessels under like conditions.
2. The tariff to be published three months before being put into force in all the capitals and the principal ports of commerce of the countries concerned.
3. For the special navigation dues the maximum of 10 francs a ton for vessels and 10 francs a head for passengers not to be exceeded.

Then on the 19th of March, 1866, the Sultan issued a firman, in which he states—

That we grant our sovereign authorization for the execution of the canal by the said company on the conditions prescribed in that agreement.

And makes that all an integral part of the firman which, of course, gave it the effect of the law. Thus the matter of tolls was settled by the concession of the Egyptian and French Governments to the De Lesseps Co., and were embodied in the Sultan's firman, and when the convention of Constantinople dealt with it, it dealt with the canal under those conditions, of course.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The convention, however, did not in any way say that the tolls should be equal.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. While as a matter of fact they are equal.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. Before the Senator from Utah concludes his observations, I wish to call his attention to article 12 of the convention of Constantinople of October 29, 1888, which is the convention to which I suppose he refers. Article 12 is as follows:

The high contracting parties, by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal, a principle which forms one of the bases of the present treaty, agree that none of them shall endeavor to obtain with respect to the canal territorial or commercial advantages or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was not unaware of that provision of the treaty; but it has not any reference to equality of tolls. Each nation is to have a right——

Mr. LODGE. Commercial equality was put into it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Equality of treatment of commerce.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It does not say equality of treatment.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. These concessions are conditions under which the Suez Canal was built. The whole world knew it, and the convention knew it when they made it, and they took the canal built under those concessions, and they did not set aside the concessions. Those are binding on the Suez Canal to-day. That firman of the Sultan is binding on the Suez Canal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not doubt, as I started to say, that the tolls are equal for all ships that pass through the canal. I was simply referring to the language of the convention itself as reflecting light upon the provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is that—

The United States adopt as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules—

"Substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople," and we find that the five rules are embodied in that convention, while, as I have shown, the first paragraph is not embodied in the convention.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems that article 12 of the Constantinople convention, as read by the Senator from New York, under the provision that none of these powers will seek commercial advantage for ships flying under one flag as against ships flying another flag. Also that each bound itself to seek and accept no "commercial advantage." If imposing upon some a less charge for transit than were paid by the ships of another would not be granting to that power a commercial advantage, what else would it be?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is perfectly apparent that the thing the convention stipulated for was free and open use of the canal for all nations. It was to be open to them all, and neither was to seek any special advantage over the other by any international arrangement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the precise language?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (reading):

That none of them shall endeavor to obtain with respect to the canal territorial or commercial advantages or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; that is it, "commercial advantages or privileges."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the language of the first paragraph of our treaty is:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

There is no such stipulation, as I understand it, in the convention of Constantinople.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the canal bill be temporarily laid aside in order that the Agricultural appropriation bill may be proceeded with.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before that takes place, though I will not object to it in a moment, I wish to say this: Speaking for myself, I listened with very much interest to the argument of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. It was acute, metaphysical, able, lawyer like, as his arguments usually are.

It is needless to say I do not agree with the main part of his argument. I think that in the main part of it he was misled by a double middle so palpable that everybody will recognize it. He dwelt upon the absurdity of "the United States Government charging itself tolls." The double middle is his use of the words "the United States." The double sense is this, in one sense as the owner and constructor of the canal and in another sense as being identical with American citizens owning ships passing through the canal and paying tolls. The United States would not be paying themselves, or "itself," as he calls them, tolls, but American shipowners would be paying the United States Government tolls. Not absurd at all, that! Only in that sense could the United States be said to be paying "itself"—that is, by calling the owners of the ships belonging to American citizens and paying into the Treasury of the United States tolls for passing through the canal—the United States. Needless to say those citizens of the United States—those shipowners—are not the United States Government, not even the population of the United States, not even a respectably large portion of the population.

But I did not intend to dwell upon that part of the Senator's speech, though I think if Senators will examine his entire argument it will be found that that is the fallacy which underlies it all the way through, and is the same fallacy which others have committed. I rose mainly for the purpose of indorsing one thing that he said—his expression of willingness to leave the disputed meaning of the treaty to international arbitration. I hope that the Senator will introduce a resolution requesting the Executive to negotiate an arbitration treaty and to submit it to the Senate. Under our treaties, not only with Great Britain but with more than a dozen other nations, we are bound to submit the interpretation of treaties to arbitration. Whichever way this vote may go, it will not settle the question of our legal power, and I want the question of our legal right under the treaty afterwards settled by some impartial international tribunal, so that at any time in the future the question shall not raise its horrid front once more. There might be and should be in international decision of it. If we repeal the exemption, I want an international decision of it. If we do not repeal it, I want an international decision of it. This vote will not interfere with that. I shall be very glad when the Senator introduces a resolution of that sort, and I shall be one Senator to vote for it.

I agree with him that if we are not prepared to submit to arbitration the question of the interpretation of treaties, then we have been speaking one voice to the world and another voice to God; we have been making a verbal pretense which does not accord with a mental reservation. I want, moreover, to see how many Senators there are who shall contend that we have the right to exempt the coastwise ships from tolls who yet insist on our being the judges in our own case solely and dogmatically, despotically, and insolently, I might say, by refusing to leave it to an impartial international tribunal to say which one of the two interpretations is right, ours or that of the other high contracting party. I was glad the other day to hear the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] say that he would be one of us to submit this question of treaty interpretation to arbitration.

Now, one sentence more and I am through. If that spirit had been earlier shown in the Senate; if a disposition to leave this matter to international arbitration had been shown; if the contrary had not been voiced—notwithstanding our solemn treaties, which should be inviolate in their sanctity—this question in its present shape would not now be here at all. So all that Senators will have to do is to show their faith in their interpretation, supported by so many labored and ingenious arguments, by their works and vote for a submission of that interpretation to arbitration. A judge of the Supreme Court of the United States and a judge of the highest court in Great Britain, and a third party selected by the two, or two of each and a fifth selected by the four, would be a fair tribunal. Any other tribunal that we choose to constitute which will be in our opinion impartial will do.

Of course, the proposition of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to submit it solely to our Supreme Court would not be fair to Great Britain any more than a proposition to submit it to her king's bench or lord high chancellor would be to us.

No nation with any pride or self-respect would ever consent to leave the interpretation of a treaty to which it was a sovereign party exclusively to the decision of the nationals of the other party.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, before we pass to another subject I want to say just another word with reference to the article of the Suez convention to which the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] called attention. Article 1 of that convention provides that—

> The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to every vessel of commerce or of war without distinction of flag.

I take it the meaning of that provision is not that there shall be equality of treatment—that is, so far as this provision is concerned; I am not speaking of some other—but under this provision there is no requirement of equality of tolls or equality of treatment. It is merely that it shall be free and open to all and all shall have a right to go through.

Article 12 says:

> The high contracting parties, by application of the principle of equality—

It does not stop there—> by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal.

That is the principle of equality that is to be kept in mind; that is, they are all to have an equal right to the free use of the canal. It is to be open to them all. But that, standing alone, not speaking of other arrangements outside the treaty itself but under this treaty, that does not involve equal treatment as regards conditions or charges. It simply refers to the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal.

Mr. ROOT. Would the Senator from Utah think it was equality as regards the free use of the canal to charge a German ship nothing and a French ship its entire value?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The canal would be free and open; they could go through.

Mr. ROOT. But there would not be equality as regards the free use.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator is right about that, if the stipulation that the canal shall be "free and open" to all ships means that they must go through upon equal terms, then I do not see why the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not stop there instead of adding "on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination, and so forth, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, and so forth."

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has insisted that the Senate should show its faith by its works, I want to say that I agree entirely with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], that whatever may be the outcome of the controversy that is now on in the Senate, I think the Government owes it to itself to see that this matter is submitted to arbitration. I very thoroughly agree with the argument made by the Senator from Utah, tending to show that we have not in anywise violated the treaty with Great Britain. I think his argument in that respect is absolutely unanswerable, but there is a difference of opinion with respect to it. So far as this present controversy is concerned, we can do but one thing, and that is to assert our conviction one way or the other upon this single question as to whether the act should be repealed or not. The question of arbitration does not enter into that in any way whatever unless we bring it in.

I hope before this debate is over the question of arbitration may in some way be directly submitted to the Senate, so that it may be voted upon.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has offered such an amendment.

Mr. WORKS. I am aware of that.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I renew my request that the canal bill be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE. I ask that House bill 13679, the Agricultural bill, be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered, is on page 18, in the item for investigating the ginning, handling, grading, baling, gin compressing, and wrapping of cotton——

Mr. McCUMBER. There does not seem to be a quorum present to vote upon the pending proposition. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GORE. I should like to inquire if the demand for a quorum can be made after the yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the committee. Unless something else had transpired, the yeas and nays having been ordered, the call of yeas and nays will secure the presence of a quorum. I hope the Senator from North Dakota will not raise the point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not the rule. The rule is that after a roll call has been begun no business shall be transacted.

Mr. GORE. That is the practice. I do not think it is the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The roll call on the pending amendment was concluded on Saturday, and it disclosed the absence of a quorum. Now the Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will pardon me, there was a roll call subsequent to the yea-and-nay call, which disclosed that there was no quorum, and on the call there was a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. And then, after a brief executive session, the Senate adjourned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about the right of the Senator from North Dakota to call for a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Burton	Fall	Kern
Bankhead	Catron	Gallinger	Lee, Md.
Borah	Chamberlain	Gore	Lippitt

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee, on page 18, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask that the amendment may be stated, so that we may understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, on page 18, beginning in line 13, to strike out "$80,580" and to insert "$180,580: Provided, That of the sum thus appropriated, $100,000 shall be used for furnishing the primary markets in the cotton-growing States with a set of the samples as standardized by the Government, and a sample of the bleached and unbleached yarns made from the different grades, showing the waste, tensile strength, and bleaching quality thereof."

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I understood that an amendment had been proposed to that amendment. Am I wrong about that? I ask that question of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, there is no amendment proposed to that amendment. I stated before the vote was taken that I should move to insert, after the sum "$100,000," the words "at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture," so that that officer might use his discretion; but I understand that with this appropriation that goes pro forma; that the Secretary of Agriculture will use his discretion in placing the appropriation where it will be properly taken care of.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from South Carolina, then, as I understand, proposes no change as to that?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that debate is not now in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). The present occupant of the chair desires to state that he is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. Not knowing how the Senator from California would vote, if present, the occupant of the chair withholds his vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] for the purpose of getting a quorum, and I vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator, I withhold my vote.
